KEAN.

We find in the London United Kingdom, the following happy sketch of that celebrated tragedian, EDMUND KEAN. The article has a claim on the attention of our readers, from the fact that it is true, and withal, most splendidly written. As such we commend it to our friends.

"Blessed were the days of boyhood, when I was young and first saw Kean; he is bound up with my early recollections—the brightest page in a dull volume. Edmund Kean was born in Castle-street, Leicester-square. I have heard much about "paternal neglect," and "deformity," and "irons on his limbs;" but believe his greatest sufferings were from poverty—"that iron entered his soul." He was "let out" as a demon at Drury, where it is recorded that he overthrew a legion of devils in Macbeth, to the dismay of Kemble, whom he mollified by saying, "he (Master Edmund) had never appeared in tragedy before." He was discharged, and sent to school: thinking "a little learning was a dangerous thing," he learnt but little—sweet words and bitter punishment were equally unavailing. One day, when the master was out of sight, he went to sea; but Kean, like Macbeth, did not like to be "cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd:" he therefore made a bad cabin-boy. His berth had nearly been his death—the vessel was bound to Behring's Straits, and they were reduced to straights beyond all bearing. He did what a bishop never does—resolved to give up the sea. He returned to London, and resolving to go into the country, got upon the stage—vicissitudes followed. At one time the provinces thought him a fair performer; at another, he performed at the fairs. He was at thy fair, oh! Bartholomew—so also was Belzoni—for the traveller and the tragedian were cotemporaneous. Richardson's theatre, if not as classic, is as gorgeous as its nobler rivals, and is certainly "sustained by the ablest pens." After rambling unnoticed and unknown, he appeared at Drury-Lane, (January, 1814;) when it is remembered that Russell-court abounds with Jews, it is not so surprising that his Shylock created a sensation. Richard followed, and then the neighborhood of Drury was fairly frighted from its propriety; the impassability of the avenues to the theatre proved that he was more than a passable performer. Coat-flaps of all hues and sizes might be bought, the mornings after his acting at "unprecedently low prices." The box-keepers (whose place had previously been sinecures) were reduced from aldermanic personages to living skeletons. He made money his first season, and took "Riches" for his benefit. He then went into the provinces, there he played day and night, and tried his strength by twelve weekly performances:—he returned to be the idol of London. Miss O'Neill came (with all her genius and attraction to Covent Garden;) but his power was undiminished. What stars for one sphere! England had not another such a pair of drawers. Great efforts were made to write Kean down: a portion of the press (like porcupines) darted their quills at him; they said he was uneducated—but he had been an Eton boy (which rather paradoxically is called being well brought up,) and was, at least, as learned as his critics. A player need not to be a Porson, and a man may be a good Orestes who is no Grecian,—one may drink at the well of learning without being required to swallow the bucket.

The technical phrase for being perfect in a part is, "He knew the author." Kean was acting in Ireland, and had not attended rehearsal; the gentleman who played Horatio to his Hamlet wished "to run through the scene" previous to going on the stage. Kean said, "It's needless, for of course you know the author." "No, sir," was the reply, "I never saw him in all my life?" The time came when the greatest living favorite should be made "the mark for human malice." Damages were given against him in the Court of King's Bench; and he was afterwards bailed at Drury, at the instigation and for the amusement of "the Times." It was enough that he was the first actor of the first theatre to insure the venom of the "barns" being directed against him,—he stood like a rock amid the storm,—he was not only Richard the Third—he was Richard Cœur de Lion; but the spirit that malice could not subdue, insult might break. Every act of his life was distorted by his maligners: they said he frequented fights and cockpits—(he was avowedly partial to Cox,) that he loved low company; it is true he was no hunter of lords. He did not "lick absurd pomp," though he thrashed two or three that were absurd and pompous. But can the society of Sheridan, Erskine, and Hazlitt (and they were his associates,) be deemed low company? An anecdote of the author of "Liber Amoris," may not be out of place here: he said his name was impervious to a pun. "That's hard," said Kean, "to say of a man who will enlighten future ages, as he has lit the present." Macaulay's triumphant article, in a late number of the "Edinburgh," has set the affair of Kean and Cox in its true light. I shall only add, that strange as it may seem, those that all the world run after find a difficulty in keeping chaste,—the excuse is allowed to ladies, and may surely extend to men. Some creatures revel over the destruction of genius as Cornish miners do over a wreck: such men gladly saw Kean sail for the United States,—there he rose, the star of Columbia. He acted under Price, but above all competition. He returned to be welcomed as actor never before was welcomed,—malice grew dumb; and detraction, "ashamed of its own work," also sought shelter in silence.

Kean's acting comes from the heart, and, consequently, goes to it—for this is the electricity of nature; his pathos is like the fountain in the sandy desert; his rage, the roaring of the mountain cataract; he knows every chord of the human lyre, and sounds them at will—his tenderness is the murmur of music; his wrath is the fury of the lion; his voice (how many recollections stir within me at his voice) has the trumpet's clangor in the battle-scene; and its mournfulness is the sighing of the wind, when it throws its low moan over the sere leaves of autumn. As a man, Kean has many errors; but "charity covereth a multitude of sins;" and his hand has ever been open to the oppressed, as it has also been closed against oppressors. He would, indeed, "help any good fellow out of a ditch, and kick any rascal into one." He never spoke harshly to a menial—he never cringed to a superior. He never brooked an insult from any man, or offered one to any woman. He rivalled Kemble—he erected a monument to the memory of Cooke. They may call him a profligate if they will, but that profligate never permitted tyranny, or endured insult; he did not take advantage of his station, to demoralize the drama; he did not tarnish the glory of his name by the seduction of ballet-dancers and chorus singers; he made desolate no father's hearth. In the blaze of prosperity he has never forgotten the partakers of his adversity; and "come what come may," a passing beggar will remember him, when with cold eyes others may look upon him." That "profligate" is a warm friend—a fond father—a man of undoubted and exalted genius—of unquestioned courage, and unbounded generosity. That "profligate" took off his great coat on one of the coldest nights of January, to wrap round the shivering form of a male mendicant (parting with his great coat was much from one who is said to be so very fond of a beautiful BENJAMIN.) Heaven send him a revival of health, and many long and happy years to enjoy it. Die when he may, in his grave will lie one who had no superior as an actor; one who triumphed over all obstacles—was the idol of England and America; one whom the widow of our Roscius declared to be superior to Kemble, and who with Sheridan for a friend, had Byron for an eulogist.

ENGLISH FOX-HUNTING.

MELTON MOWBRAY.

The last number of the Foreign Quarterly Review, contains an excellent article which we copy to-day, on the exhilirating old English Sport of Fox-Hunting. We thought an insertion of it would please our friends more than almost any thing of the kind we could present. This mode of hunting "sly Reynard," has rather fallen away in this country, though at the South, it is occasionally revived by some "old English Gentlemen," as they are termed in Virginia. In New-York or Pennsylvania it seldom or ever occurs that horses are introduced in this Sport, and never we believe in the New-England States. This is not to be wondered at from the fact that the expense of keeping a pack of Fox-Hounds is about $20,000, per annum, at least in England. The Hunters cost from $2,000 to $4,500 each.

The recent retirement of the Duke of Rutland from the field has been felt to leave a vacuum in the hunting world. Those hounds are now in the possession of a very popular young nobleman, Lord Forester; and his grace subscribes £1200 per annum towards their support; but the Duke himself no longer hunts, neither is there the annual assemblage of sportsmen that was wont to be with in the walls of Belvoir Castle. These are circumstances which have caused much regret; for his grace retires with the good name of all the fox-hunting population. He "did the the thing" with princely magnificence, both in doors and out; and if materials had been sought for to furnish a faithful representation of the style and grandeur of the genuine English nobleman, giving a fair part of his attention to the arrangements of the chase, we have reason to believe they would have been all met with at Belvoir.

Although most foreigners express vast surprise that we should go to such expenses in hunting the fox; unattended by the parade of the continental chasse, yet several of them have of late been induced to make their appearance in Leicestershire, and some few have shown that, had they been born Englishmen, and rightly initiated in the art, they must have been conspicuous characters in the field. The performance of Count Sandore an Hungarian nobleman, who risided one year at Melton Mowbray, on a visit to Lord Alvanley, have already met the public eye, and his daring horsemanship, and consequent mishaps, formed the subject of an amusing tale. From a ludicrous description given of them by himself, a series of pictures were painted by Mr. Ferneley, of Melton Mowbray, representing him in as extraordinary and perilous situation as the imagination of man could have conceived. Fiction, however, was not resorted to, every scene being a real one; and the count—the delight of the Meltonians—carried them to his own country, on his return, together with some English mares to produce hunters, having had a good taste of the breed. He was mounted by Mr. Tilbury, a celebrated horse dealer in London, who found him a stud of 8 horses for the season, for the moderate sum of one thousand pounds, in concluding every contingent expense. Count Bathiana was likewise at Melton last year, as also Count Hahn, from Germany; and Count Matuchevitch, the Russian minister, is residing there now. His excellency has ten hunters of his own, rides hard, and is much esteemed by the Meltonians, and all sportsmen in the neighborhood. During the visit of Don Miguel to the Duke of Wellington at Strathfieldsay, a few years back, he went out with the Vine hounds, (late Mr. Chute's,) to which his grace is a subscriber. He rode a celebrated hunter of the late king's and gallantly did he put him along. It too often happens, however, on such occasions, when sport is most anxiously desired for the amusement of some distinguished individual, that the game runs short, or the scent lies faintly. Such was good deal the case in this instance, although there was running enough to show that Miguel would have stopped at nothing that might have come in his way to oppose his being with the hounds. Of his qualities as a sportsman there was little opportunity of judging, but he certainly showed himself to be a horseman of a superior cast; insomuch that those who observed him were little astonished with the accounts of his personal activity in the first weeks of his return to Portugal: he, at that crisis, is said to have ridden six hundred miles in six successive days, a feat which those that have travelled on Portuguese roads will appreciate. So much for, we fear, one of the last persons to whom any body would think of applying Woodsworth's eulogium on the "Shepherd Lord."

"In him the savage virtue of the chase,
Revenge, and all ferocious thoughts, were dead."

It is a hackneyed enough remark, that both ancient and modern writers make sad work of it when they attempt a description of heaven. To describe a run with fox hounds is a not much easier task; but to make the attempt with any other country than Leicestershire in our eye, would be giving a chance away. Let us then suppose ourselves at Ashby Pasture, in the Quorn country, with Mr Osbaldeston's hounds. Let us also indulge ourselves with a fine morning, in the first week of February, and at least two hundred well-mounted men by the cover's side. Time being called—say quarter past eleven, nearly our great grandfather's dinner hour—the hounds approach the furze-brake, or gorse, as it is called in that region. "Hark, in Hark!" with a slight cheer, and perhaps one wave of his cap, says Mr. Osbaldeston, who has long hunted his own pack, and in an instant he has not a hound at his horse's heels. In a very short time the gorse appears shaken in various parts of the cover—apparently from an unknown cause, not a single hound being for some minutes visible. Presently one or two appear, leaping over some old furze which they cannot push through, and exhibit to the field their glossy skins and spotted sides. "Oh your beauties!" exclaims some old Meltonian, rapturously fond of the sport. Two minutes more elapse: another hound slips out of cover, and takes a short turn outside, with his nose to the ground and his stern lashing his side—thinking no doubt he might touch on a drag, should Reynard have been abroad in the night. Hounds have no business to think, thinks the second whipper-in, who observes him; but one crack with his whip, with "Raselas, Rasselas, where are you going Rasselas? Get to cover, Rasselas;" and Rasselas immediately disappears. Five minutes more pass away. "No fox here," says one; "Don't be in a hurry" cries Mr. Craddock (1) "they are drawing it beautifully, and there is rare lying in it." These words are scarcely uttered, when the cover shakes more than ever. Every stem appears alive, and it reminds us of a corn field waving in the wind. In two minutes the stems of some more hounds are seen "flinishing," (2) above the gorse. "Have at him, there," hallos the Squire (3) the gorse still more alive, and hounds leaping over each other's backs. "Have at him there again, my boys!" Him—a fox for a hundred pounds! rats the Squire—, biting his finger in his cap, and putting a screw which, not being set to music, we cannot give here. Jack Stevens (the first whipper in) looks at his watch. At this moment "John White," "Val. Maher," "Frank Holyocke," (who will pardon us for giving them in the mauvais chasse (4) and twenty three more of the first ones, are seen creeping gently on tow ards a point at which they think it probable he may break. "Hold hard there," says a sportsman; but he might as well speak to the winds. "Stand still, gentlemen; pray stand still," exclaims the huntsman, he might as well say to the sun. During the time we have been speaking of, all the field have been awake—gloves put on—cigars thrown away—the bridle reins gathered well up into the hand, and hats pushed down upon the brow.

At this interesting period, a Snob, (5) just arrived from a very rural country, and unknown to any one, but determined to witness the start, gets in o a conspicuous situation: "Come away, Sir!" hollos the master, (little suspecting the Snob may be nothing less than one of the Quarterly Reviewers.) "What mischief are you doing there? Do you think you can catch the fox?" A breathless silence ensues. At length a whisper is heard in the cover—like the voice of a dog in a dream; it is Flour sher, (6) and the Squire cheers him to the echo. In an instant a hound challenges—and another—and another. 'Tis enough. "Tallyho!" cries a countryman in a tree. "He's gone," exclaims Lord Alvanley; and clapping spurs to his horse, in an instant is in the front rank.

As all good sportsmen would say, "Ware, hounds!" cries Sir Harry Goodriche. "Give them time," exclaims Mr. John Moore. "That's right," says Mr. Osbaldeston, "spoil your own sport as usual." "Go along," roars out Mr. Holyoake, "there are three couple of hounds on the scent." "That's your sort" says Billy Coke (7) coming up at the rate of thirty miles an hour on advance, with a label pinned on his back, "she kicks," "the rest are all coming, and there's a rare scent to day, I'm sure." Bonaparte's Old Guard, in its best days, would not have stopped such men as those, so long as life remained in them.

Only those who have witnessed it can know in what an extraordinary manner hounds that are left behind in cover make their way through the crowd, and get up to the leading ones in the pack, which have been fortunate in getting away with their fox. It is true, they possess the speed of a race-horse; but nothing short of their high mettle could induce them to thread their way thro' a body of horseman going at the best pace, with the prospect of being ridden over and maimed at every stride they take. But as Beckford observes, "Tis the dash of the foxhound which distinguishes him." A turn, however, in their favor, or a momentary loss of scent in the few hounds that have shot ahead—an occurrence to be looked for on such occasions—joins head and tail together and the scent being good, every hound settles to his fox; the pace gradually proves: vires acquirit eundo; a terrible burst is the result.

At the end of nineteen minutes the hounds came to a fault, and for a moment the fox has a chance—in fact, they have been pressed upon by the horses, and have rather over run the scent—"What a pity" says one; "What a shame" cries another—alluding perhaps, to a young one, who would and could have gone still faster. "You may thank yourselves for this," exclaims Osbaldeston, well up at the time, Clasher looking fresh; but only fourteen men of the two hundred are to be counted—all the rest coming. At one blast of the horn, the hounds are back to the point at which the scent has failed, Jack Stevens being in his place to turn them. "Yo doit! Pastime," says the Squire, as she feathers her stern down the hedge row, looking more beautiful than ever. She speaks! "Worth a thousand by Jupiter!" cries John White, looking over his left shoulder as he sends both spurs into Buxton, delighted to see only four more of the field are up. Our Snob, however is amongst them. He has "gone a good one," and his countenance is expressive of delight, as he urges his horse to his speed to get again into a front place.

The pencil of the painter is now wanting; and unless the painter should be a sportsman, even his pencil would be worth little. What a country is before him!—what a panorama does it represent! Not a field of less than forty—some a hundred acres—and no more signs of the plough than in the wilds of Siberia. See the hounds in a body that might be covered by a damask tablecloth—every stern down, and every head up, for there is no need of stooping, the scent lying breast high. But we crush!—the music—how to describe these? Reader, there is no crash now, and not much music. It is the tinker that makes a great noise over little work, but at the pace the hounds are going there is no time for babbling—Peschance one hound in ten may throw his tongue as he goes to inform his comrades, as it were, that the villain is on before them, and most musically do the light notes of vocal and far-famed Venus fall on the ear of those who may be within reach to catch them. But who is so fortunate in this second burst, nearly as terrible as the first? Our fancy supplies us again, and we think we could name them all. If we look to the left, nearly abreast of the pack, we see six men going gallantly, and quite as straight as the hounds themselves are going; and on the right are four more, riding equally well, though the former have rather the best of it, owing to having had the inside of the hounds at the last two turns, which must be placed to the chapter of accidents. A short way in the rear, by no means too much so to enjoy this brilliant run, are the rest of the elite of the field, who had come up at the first check; and a few who, thanks to the goodness of their steeds, and their determination to be with the hounds, appear as if dropped from the clouds. Some however begin to show symptoms of distress. Two horses are seen loose in the distance—a report is flying about that one of the field is badly hurt—and something is heard of a cellar bone being broken, others say it is a leg; but the pace is too good to inquire. A cracking of rails is now heard and one gentleman's horse is to be seen resting, nearly balanced, across one of them, his rider being on his back in the ditch, which is on the landing side. "Who is he?" says Lord Bruderell to Jack Stevens. "Can't tell, my Lord; but I thought it was a queer-ish place when I came over it before." It is evidently a case of peril, but the pace is too good to afford help.

Up to this time, "Snob" has gone quite in the first flight; the "Pons" begin to eye him, and when an opportunity offers, the question is asked—"Who is that fellow on the little bay horse?" "Don't know him," says Mr. Little Gilmore, (a fourteen stone Scotchman, by the-by,) ganging gallantly to his hounds.—"He can ride," exclaims Lord Ranelife. "A tip-top provincial, depend upon it," adds Lord Plymouth, going quite at his ease on a thorough bred nag, three stone above his weight, and in perfect racing trim. Animal nature, however, will cry "enough," how good soever she may be, if unreasonable man press her beyond the point. The line of scent lies right athwart a large grass ground, (as a field is termed in Leicestershire,) somewhat on the ascent, abounding in ant hills, or hillocks, peculiar to old grazing land, and thrown up by the plough, some hundred years since, into rather high ridges, with deep, holding furrows between each. The fence at the top is impracticable—Mr. Tonie, "a stopper;" nothing for it but a gate, leading into a broad green lane, high and strong, with deep slippery ground on each side of it. "Now for the timber jumper," cries Osbaldeston, pleased to find himself upon Clasher. "For heaven's sake, take care of my hounds, in case they may be thrown up in the lane." Snob is here in the best of company, and that moment perhaps the happiest of his life: but not satisfied with his situation, wishing to out Herod Herod, and to have a fine story to tell when he gets home, he pushes to his speed on ground on which all regular Leicestershire men are careful, and the death warrant of the little bay horse is signed. It is true he gets first to the gate, and has no idea of opening it; sees it contains fine new and strong bars, that will neither bend nor break; has a great idea of a fall, but no idea of refusing; presses his hat firmly on his head, and gets his whip hand at liberty to give the good little nag a refresher, but all at once he perceives that it will not do. When attempting to collect him for the effort he finds his mouth dead and his neck stiff; fancies he hears something like a wheezing in his throat; and discovering quite unexpectedly, that the gate would open wisely avoids a fall which was booked, had he attempted to leap it. He pulls up then at the gate; and as he places the hook of his whip under the latch, John White goes over it close to the hinge post, and Captain Ross, upon Clasher, follows him. The Reverend then walks through.

The scene now shifts. On the other side of the lane is a fence of this description: it is a newly plashed hedge, abounding in strong growers as they are called, and a yawning ditch on the further side; but as is peculiar to Leicestershire and Northamptonshire, a considerable portion of the blackthorn, left uncut, leans outwards from the hedge, somewhat about breast high. This large fence is taken by all now with the hounds—some to the right and some to the left of the direct line—but the little bay horse would have no more of it. Snob put him twice at it, and manfully too, but the wind is out of him, and he has no power to rise. Several scrambles, but only one fall, occur at this "rasper" all having nearly enough of the killing pace; and a mile and a half further, the second horses are fallen in with, just in the nick of time. A short check from the stain of sheep makes every thing comfortable; and the Squire having hit off his fox like a workman, thirteen men, out of two hundred, are fresh mounted, and with the hounds, which settle to the scent again at a truly killing pace.

"Hold hard, Holyoake!" exclaims Mr. Osbaldeston (now mounted on Blucher,) knowing what double-quick time he would be marching to with fresh paces to play upon, and the crowd well shaken off, "pray him there, Abigail and Fickle good bitches—see what a head they are carrying! I'll bet a thousand they kill him!" "The country appears better and better." "He's taking a capital line," exclaims Sir Harry Goodriche, as he points out to Sir James Musgrave two young Forrester hounds, who are particularly distinguishing themselves at the moment. "Worth a dozen Reform Bills," shouts Sir Francis Burdette, sitting erect upon Samson, (1) and putting his hand straight at a yawner. "We shall have the Whissendine only when hounds are back to the point at which the scent has failed, Jack Stevens being in his place to turn them. "Yo doit! Pastime," says the Squire, as she feathers her stern down the hedge row, looking more beautiful than ever. She speaks! "Worth a thousand by Jupiter!" cries John White, looking over his left shoulder as he sends both spurs into Buxton, delighted to see only four more of the field are up. I'll bet a thousand they kill him!" "The country appears better and better." "He's taking a capital line," exclaims Sir Harry Goodriche, as he points out to Sir James Musgrave two young Forrester hounds, who are particularly distinguishing themselves at the moment. "Worth a dozen Reform Bills," shouts Sir Francis Burdette, sitting erect upon Samson, (1) and putting his hand straight at a yawner. "We shall have the Whissendine only when hounds are back to the point at which the scent has failed, Jack Stevens being in his place to turn them. "Yo doit! Pastime," says the Squire, as she feathers her stern down the hedge row, looking more beautiful than ever. She speaks! "Worth a thousand by Jupiter!" cries John White, looking over his left shoulder as he sends both spurs into Buxton, delighted to see only four more of the field are up. Our Snob, however is amongst them. He has "gone a good one," and his countenance is expressive of delight, as he urges his horse to his speed to get again into a front place.

The pencil of the painter is now wanting; and unless the painter should be a sportsman, even his pencil would be worth little. What a country is before him!—what a panorama does it represent! Not a field of less than forty—some a hundred acres—and no more signs of the plough than in the wilds of Siberia. See the hounds in a body that might be covered by a damask tablecloth—every stern down, and every head up, for there is no need of stooping, the scent lying breast high. But we crush!—the music—how to describe these? Reader, there is no crash now, and not much music. It is the tinker that makes a great noise over little work, but at the pace the hounds are going there is no time for babbling—Peschance one hound in ten may throw his tongue as he goes to inform his comrades, as it were, that the villain is on before them, and most musically do the light notes of vocal and far-famed Venus fall on the ear of those who may be within reach to catch them. But who is so fortunate in this second burst, nearly as terrible as the first? Our fancy supplies us again, and we think we could name them all. If we look to the left, nearly abreast of the pack, we see six men going gallantly, and quite as straight as the hounds themselves are going; and on the right are four more, riding equally well, though the former have rather the best of it, owing to having had the inside of the hounds at the last two turns, which must be placed to the chapter of accidents. A short way in the rear, by no means too much so to enjoy this brilliant run, are the rest of the elite of the field, who had come up at the first check; and a few who, thanks to the goodness of their steeds, and their determination to be with the hounds, appear as if dropped from the clouds. Some however begin to show symptoms of distress. Two horses are seen loose in the distance—a report is flying about that one of the field is badly hurt—and something is heard of a cellar bone being broken, others say it is a leg; but the pace is too good to inquire. A cracking of rails is now heard and one gentleman's horse is to be seen resting, nearly balanced, across one of them, his rider being on his back in the ditch, which is on the landing side. "Who is he?" says Lord Bruderell to Jack Stevens. "Can't tell, my Lord; but I thought it was a queer-ish place when I came over it before." It is evidently a case of peril, but the pace is too good to afford help.

Up to this time, "Snob" has gone quite in the first flight; the "Pons" begin to eye him, and when an opportunity offers, the question is asked—"Who is that fellow on the little bay horse?" "Don't know him," says Mr. Little Gilmore, (a fourteen stone Scotchman, by the-by,) ganging gallantly to his hounds.—"He can ride," exclaims Lord Ranelife. "A tip-top provincial, depend upon it," adds Lord Plymouth, going quite at his ease on a thorough bred nag, three stone above his weight, and in perfect racing trim. Animal nature, however, will cry "enough," how good soever she may be, if unreasonable man press her beyond the point. The line of scent lies right athwart a large grass ground, (as a field is termed in Leicestershire,) somewhat on the ascent, abounding in ant hills, or hillocks, peculiar to old grazing land, and thrown up by the plough, some hundred years since, into rather high ridges, with deep, holding furrows between each. The fence at the top is impracticable—Mr. Tonie, "a stopper;" nothing for it but a gate, leading into a broad green lane, high and strong, with deep slippery ground on each side of it. "Now for the timber jumper," cries Osbaldeston, pleased to find himself upon Clasher. "For heaven's sake, take care of my hounds, in case they may be thrown up in the lane." Snob is here in the best of company, and that moment perhaps the happiest of his life: but not satisfied with his situation, wishing to out Herod Herod, and to have a fine story to tell when he gets home, he pushes to his speed on ground on which all regular Leicestershire men are careful, and the death warrant of the little bay horse is signed. It is true he gets first to the gate, and has no idea of opening it; sees it contains fine new and strong bars, that will neither bend nor break; has a great idea of a fall, but no idea of refusing; presses his hat firmly on his head, and gets his whip hand at liberty to give the good little nag a refresher, but all at once he perceives that it will not do. When attempting to collect him for the effort he finds his mouth dead and his neck stiff; fancies he hears something like a wheezing in his throat; and discovering quite unexpectedly, that the gate would open wisely avoids a fall which was booked, had he attempted to leap it. He pulls up then at the gate; and as he places the hook of his whip under the latch, John White goes over it close to the hinge post, and Captain Ross, upon Clasher, follows him. The Reverend then walks through.

The scene now shifts. On the other side of the lane is a fence of this description: it is a newly plashed hedge, abounding in strong growers as they are called, and a yawning ditch on the further side; but as is peculiar to Leicestershire and Northamptonshire, a considerable portion of the blackthorn, left uncut, leans outwards from the hedge, somewhat about breast high. This large fence is taken by all now with the hounds—some to the right and some to the left of the direct line—but the little bay horse would have no more of it. Snob put him twice at it, and manfully too, but the wind is out of him, and he has no power to rise. Several scrambles, but only one fall, occur at this "rasper" all having nearly enough of the killing pace; and a mile and a half further, the second horses are fallen in with, just in the nick of time. A short check from the stain of sheep makes every thing comfortable; and the Squire having hit off his fox like a workman, thirteen men, out of two hundred, are fresh mounted, and with the hounds, which settle to the scent again at a truly killing pace.

"Hold hard, Holyoake!" exclaims Mr. Osbaldeston (now mounted on Blucher,) knowing what double-quick time he would be marching to with fresh paces to play upon, and the crowd well shaken off, "pray him there, Abigail and Fickle good bitches—see what a head they are carrying! I'll bet a thousand they kill him!" "The country appears better and better." "He's taking a capital line," exclaims Sir Harry Goodriche, as he points out to Sir James Musgrave two young Forrester hounds, who are particularly distinguishing themselves at the moment. "Worth a dozen Reform Bills," shouts Sir Francis Burdette, sitting erect upon Samson, (1) and putting his hand straight at a yawner. "We shall have the Whissendine, (2) "Who is that under his horse in the brook?" inquires that good sportsman and fine rider, Mr. Green, of Rollenston, whose noted old mare had just skimmed over the water like a swallow on a summer's evening. "Only Dick Christian," (3) answers Lord Forester, "and it is nothing new to him." "But he'll be drowned," exclaims Lord Kinnaird. "I shouldn't wonder," observes Mr. William Coke. But the pace is too good to inquire.

The fox does his best to escape: he threads hedge rows, tries the out buildings of a farm-house, and once turns so short as nearly to run his foil; but—the perfection of the thing—the hounds turn shorter than he does, as much as to say—die you shall. The pace has been awful for the last twenty minutes. Three horses are blown to a stand-still, and few are going at their ease. "Out upon this great carcass of mine; no horse that was ever foaled can live under it at this pace, and over this country," says one of the best of the welter-weights, as he stands over his four hundred guinea chesnut, then rising from the ground, after giving him a heavy fall—his tail nearly erect in the air, his nostrils violently distended, and his eyes almost fixed. "Not hurt, I hope," exclaimed Mr. Maxse, to somebody whom he gets a glimpse of through the openings of a tall quickset hedge which is between them, coming neck and croup into the adjoining field, from the top bar of a high, hog-backed style. His eye might have been spared the unpleasing sight, had not his ear been attracted to a sort of procumbit-ur-inhonesto-mundo of a horse falling to the ground on its back, the bone of his left thigh indenting the green-sward within two inches of his rider's thigh. It is young Sefton, (3) who having missed his second horse at the check, had been going nearly half the way in distress; but from nerve and pluck, perhaps peculiar to Englishmen, but very peculiar to himself, got within three fields of his brilliant run. The fall was all but a certainty; for it was the third stiff timber there that had unfortunately opposed him, after his horse's wind had been pumped out by the pace; but he was too good to refuse them, and his horse knew better than to refuse.

Æneid Virgil ends with a death, and a chase is not complete without it. The fox dies within half a mile of Woodwell-head, evidently his point from the first: the pack pulling him down in the middle of a large grass field, every hound but one at his brush. Jack Stevens with him in his hands would be a subject worthy of Edwin Landseer himself: a black thorn, which has laid hold of his cheek, has besmeared his upper garments with blood, and one side of his head and cap are cased in mud, by a fall he has had in a lane, his horse having alighted in the ruts from a high flight of rails; but he has ridden the same horse throughout the run, and has handled him so well, he would have gone two miles further, if the chase had been continued so long. Osbaldeston's who-hoop might have been heard to Cottesmore, had the wind set in that direction, and every man present is ecstatic with delight. "Quite the cream of the thing, I suppose," says Lord Gardner, a very promising young one, at this time fresh in Leicestershire. "The cream of everything in the shape of fox hunting," observes the excellent sportsman Sir James Musgrave, at that moment at his watch. "Just ten miles, as the crow flies, in one hour and ten minutes, with but two trifling checks, over the finest country in the world. What superb hounds are these!" added the baronet, as he turned his horse's head to the wind. "You are right," says Col. Lowther, "they are perfect. I wish my father had seen them do their work to day." Some of the field now come up, who could not live in the first flight; but as there is no jealousy here they congratulate each other on the fine day's sport, and each man turns his head towards home.

A large party dine this evening at the old club, where, of course, this fine run is discussed, and the following accurate description of it is given by one of the oldest members, a true friend to fox-hunting, and to all mankind as well:—"We found him," said he, "at Ashby Pasture, and got away with him, up wind, at a shapping pace over Barrow Hill, leaving Europe Trusses to the right, when a trifling check occurred. He then pointed for Ranksborough gorse, which some feared, and others hoped, he might hang in a little, but he was too good to go near it. Leaving that on his right also, he crossed the brook to Whissendine, going within half a mile of the village, and then he had nothing for it but to fly. That magnificent country, in the direction of Teigit, was open to him, and he showed that he had the courage to face it. Leaving Teigh on the right, Woolwell-head was his point, and in two more fields he would have reached it. Thus we found him in the Quorn country; ran him over the finest part of Lord Lonsdale's and killed him on the borders of the Belvoir. Sir Bellingham Graham's hounds once gave just such another ticklee from the same place, and at the same time, when the field was nearly as much beaten as they were to day."

But we have left Snob in the lane, who, after casting a longing eye towards his more fortunate companions, who were still keeping well in with the hounds—throws the rein over the neck of the good little bay horse, and, walking by his side, that he may recover his wind, enquires his way to Melton. Having no one to converse with, he thus soliloquizes as he goes:—"What a doit have I been, to spend five hundred a year on my stable, in any country but this! But stop a little: how is it that I, weighing but eleven stone four pounds with my saddle, and upon my best horse, an acknowledged good one in my own country, could neither go so fast nor so long as that heavy fellow Maxse; that still heavier Lord Alvanley, and that Monster Tom Edge, who, they tell me, weighs eighteen stone, at least, in the scales." At this moment, a bridle gate

FOREIGN NEWS.

Since our last, by the arrival on Monday afternoon of the packet ship CANADA Capt. Wilson, from Liverpool, we have received London and Liverpool dates to the 31st of March; the Canada sailed on the day following.

The only important news we find is, that the Cholera has broken out in Paris, though it is thought its ravages will not be of so serious a character, as in England.

LATER. The London packet ship COLUMBIA, Capt. Delano, arrived on Tuesday morning, bringing dates to the evening of the 31st; those by the Canada were to the morning of that day. They contain no additional information of importance.

The official Cholera Report is one day later.—Under date of the 31st of March, it states that there were 87 new cases in London, and 44 deaths, since the preceding day. In the country 33 new cases and 16 deaths.

DUELLING IN FRANCE.—In consequence of some reflections by the Editor of the Tribune on Marshal Lobau, Commandant of the Parisian National Guard, four officers on the staff of the Marshal, last week, paid a visit to the office of the Tribune et Mouvement with—to use homely language—a very bullying message. Taken unaware, the principal editor refused to meet a body of persons, but offered to give the Marshal himself personal satisfaction. The affair got wind, however, and in the course of the day many hundred young men left their cards at the office of the Tribune, praying to be allowed as assistant editors (redacteurs,) to take off the odds; and, accordingly, the Tribune of Thursday, intimated to the etat-major publicly in its columns, that 67 "editors of the Tribune" were ready to go out with the 67 officers of which the etat-major (staff) is composed. Saturday produced the first of the duels resulting from this challenge en masse. The principals in this affair were Gen. Jacqueminot (of the etat-major) and M. Belmonte, the editor (in chief) of the Tribune. The former was attended by Gen. Gourgaud and Col. Taunton; the latter by Col. Bracqueville (a deputy) and M. Cattel, editor of the National. After an exchange of shots, the seconds interfered, and that particular affair was at last made up. It is by no means certain, however, that the remaining 66 officers of etat-major will not call out the remaining 66 editors of the Tribune.

A DENIAL.—In a recent debate in the British House of Commons, Mr. Dawes alluded to some of his opponents, and among others to "the noble member from Sussex, who was asleep." Lord G. Lenox arose and declared that he "was not asleep,—he had kept awake, although he had been in the House for many hours, and had been compelled to listen to Dawes' speech s."

"GOOD SOCIETY."—The following strange occurrence has taken place at Champignolles (Eure) France:

An inhabitant of the village having dug a hole to entrap a wolf, put upon it a live goose as a bait for the voracious animal. Another inhabitant, on perceiving the fluttering goose at a distance, approached it, and fell into the ditch, which was eight feet deep, the sides being cut out so as to form an inverted cone. He vainly attempted to get out, and was patiently waiting for the return of day. But he had not waited long when something very heavy fell upon his shoulders. This was a wolf attracted by the bait. The fright of the man may be easily imagined: that of the wolf was equally great, for he immediately got into a corner, whence he did not stir all night. When day appeared, the man who had made the trap came up for his prey, and was not a little surprised at finding his two prisoners. The man was taken out more dead than alive. No forbearance was shown to the wolf, which was killed, for his forbearance during the night.—Gabignani.

FASHIONS.

Prince Muckler Paskan is high authority upon all that pertains to fashion, and our lady readers will be surprised at his description of Almack's.

"The first Almack's ball took place this evening; and from all I had heard of this celebrated assembly, I was really curious to see it; but never were my expectations so disappointed. It was not much better than at Brighton. A large bare room, with a bad floor, and ropes around it, like the space in an Arab camp parted off for the horses; two or three small naked rooms at the side, in which were served the most wretched refreshments; and a company into which, spite of the immense difficulty of getting tickets, a great many 'Nobodies' had wriggled; in which the dress was generally as tasteless as the 'tournure, was bad; this was all. In a word, a sort of innentertainment—the music and the lighting the only good things. And yet Almack's is the acknowledging point of the English world of fashion.

"This overstrained simplicity had, however, originally a motive. People of real fashion wished to oppose something extremely cheap to the monstrous 'taste' of the rich 'parvenus;' while the institution of lady-patronesses, without whose approbation no one could be admitted, would render it inaccessible to them. Money and bad company (in the aristocratical sense of the word) have, however, forced their way; and the only characteristic which has been retained is the unseemly place, which is not unlike the 'local' of a shooting ball in our large towns, and forms a most ludicrous contrast with the general splendor and luxury of England."

DESCRIPTION OF CROCKFORD.—"This person is a man of genius, who has raised himself from the estate of a poor fish-monger to that of the scourge, and at the same time the favorite of the rich and fashionable world. He is a gambler who has won millions (German money), and with them has built a gambling palace on the plan of the salons at Paris; but with a truly Asiatic splendor almost surpassing loyalty. Every thing is in the new revived taste of Louis XIV., decorated with all less excrescences, excess of guilding, confused mixture of stucco painting, &c.—a turn of fashion very consistent in a country where nobility grows more and more like that of the time of Louis XIV.——— The company forms a club; admission is very difficult to obtain, and altho' games of hazard are illegal in England, most of the Ministers are members, and the—— the Premier, one of the managers of this gaming club!"

THE TOILETTE OF A LONDON DANDY.—As a couple of the necessities of a London dandy, I send you the following statement by my 'fashionable wash-woman,' who his employed by some of the most distinguished 'elegans,' and is the only person who can make cravats of the right stiffness, or fold the bosom of the shirts with plaits of the right size. An 'elegant' then requires per week—twenty shirts, twenty-four pocket handkerchiefs, (unless he wears black ones,) a dozen waistcoats, and stockings 'ad libitum.' I see your housewifely soul aghast! But as a dandy cannot get on without dressing three or four times a day, the affair is 'tout simple,' for he must appear—1st. In breakfast toilette—a chintz dressing gown and Turkish slippers. 2d Morning riding dress—frock coat, boots and spurs. 3d Dinner dress—dress coat and shoes. 4th Ball dress, with 'pumps,' a word signifying shoes as thin as paper.—Tour of a German Prince.

Some boys a few days since caught two young foxes on the farm of George Anderson, Esq. They carried them to Mr. Anderson's house, and put them with a cat that had two small kittens—puss immediately took them into possession, and nourishes them as attentively as if they were her own offspring—the young reynards seem perfectly contented with their new mother.—Cornwall (C. C.) Observer.

SLANDER

COMMON PLEAS—BEFORE JUDGE IRVING.

George Jones vs. Alexander Wilson.

This was an action for slander. The plaintiff alledged that he was a familiar associate and intimate friend of Mary Ann Duff, and Mary C. W. Duff, her daughter, and betrothed in marriage to the daughter; that on the 16th day of January 1832, in a conversation between the defendant and Mrs. Duff, the defendant declared that "he hoped Miss Duff never would be the wife of Jones, for that to his knowledge, he was a most unworthy young man; that go where he would, he would get into debt and cheat people, and then leave the place; and that he had received letters from Mrs. Barnard containing money, which he denied receiving."

The plaintiff further alleged that Wilson the defendant, had said that "he had taken a gold chain from the neck of a lady, the wife of a gentleman in whose family he visited, and that when he returned to Boston, the husband would take him up for the theft."

By reason of these grievances, the plaintiff averred that he was greatly injured in his good name, and that the said Mary C. W. Duff did in consequence refuse to receive his attentions. The plaintiff then read in evidence the deposition of Mrs. Mary Ann Duff, Mrs. D. being unwell, and not able to attend. It was as follows:

City and County of New-York, ss.

Mary Ann Duff of the said city, being duly sworn, doth depose and say, that she has been acquainted with the parties in the above entitled cause for some years—has heard defendant say that plaintiff was a most unworthy young man; that wherever he went he got in debt and left the place and cheated people; that plaintiff had done so in Portland. These words of defendant were spoken in January last in the Richmond-Hill Theatre, in the green room thereof. That a great many of the performers heard these words—they were spoken in a loud tone. The defendant also said that Jones had received letters with money in them from Mrs. Bernard, and had denied the receipt of said letters. The words aforesaid were repeated several times that morning and on different occasions. That said Mrs. Bernard is the widow of Charles Bernard. Defendant said that plaintiff had taken a gold chain from the neck of a lady, the wife of a gentleman in whose family he visited, and that when he returned to Boston, the husband would take him up for the theft. This was said some few days after the first charges made by defendant against the plaintiff. Defendant said he had heard a report that deponent's daughter was married to plaintiff. Defendant has often said that he hoped deponent's daughter was not married to plaintiff, and that she would not be. Defendant gave reasons for what he said, as they are detailed in the former part of this examination. Deponent did not know that plaintiff was a suitor to her daughter at that time, and told defendant so. That plaintiff was as intimate in deponent's family as a brother. Deponent, in consequence of the slanders, wrote a letter to her daughter in Philadelphia—the letter now produced marked A.—Said letter was written under excitement, immediately after the first conversations aforesaid with defendant. Deponent did not believe the stories of defendant, but she thinks that defendant believed them, and that said stories were calculated to be prejudicial to the reputation of her and her children. That the letter A aforesaid was written to deponent's daughter, Mary C. W. Duff.

Cross examined. Deponent has known defendant for about nine or ten years. Deponent always thought that defendant was friendly to her and family until now. Deponent understood defendant to mean that plaintiff defrauded people by not paying his debts. She so understands the meaning of the word cheat. Deponent says that defendant said he could take his oath that his charges were true against plaintiff. Defendant said I know it to be true: I can take my oath of it. Deponent thinks that whenever defendant told these stories he was believed, to the detriment and destruction of plaintiff's character. Deponent did not and does not believe the stories against Mr. Jones. That she had never heard any persons but defendant and Mrs. Pelby speak against Mr. Jones. Defendant said that he knew Mr Jones had received the letters with money from Mrs. Bernard, mentioned heretofore, and did not say that any person had told him of it—and defendant has never said so to her recollection. That the conversation aforesaid relative to the gold chain took place on the same day that defendant read a letter to her, addressed to Mr. Jones, which letter defendant said he meant to send to said Jones. In which letter there was an allusion to the circumstances of the golden chain. Deponent thinks that defendant meant to convey the idea that Mr. Jones had committed a theft in taking said chain. That defendant's story about the gold chain, was told some days (she cannot say how many,) after the letter A aforesaid was written by deponent. That no one was present. Then defendant told the story of the gold chain. That it was in a private room, where they had retired at defendant's request.

Direct examination resumed.

Deponent wrote the letter marked A in consequence of the stories told to her by defendant. That she wrote, not because she believed the stories of defendant, but because defendant said that every body believed these things, and it would be prejudicial to the reputation of her and her children to have Mr Jones continue his intimacy in her family. That Mr. Jones has continued his intimacy in her family as usual, since the explanation. Mr. Jones was in Philadelphia at the time letter A was written.

(Signed) MARY ANN DUFF.

A portion of the letter addressed by Mrs. Duff to her daughter was read in evidence, from which it appeared that she insisted that Mr. Jones should discontinue his visits to her, until his character was cleared up.

The defence set up was, that Mr Wilson, at the time of uttering the words complained of, gave the name of Mrs. Bernard as his authority, and that that was a sufficient justification.

Richard Bass-ll, manager of the Richmond Hill Theatre testified that he knew all the parties in the case: that Mrs. Duff and Jones were on terms of intimacy as soon as Jones returned to this city from Philadelphia, which had continued ever since. Jones came immediately to his house when he returned from Philadelphia. In his cross-examination, he stated that Wilson once began to speak to him against Jones, but he refused to hear him. He then was the subject of remark in the Theatre.

John F. Foote testified, that Mr Wilson stated in the Theatre that he had heard from Mrs. Bernard that Jones had taken money from her which he had not applied to the use she had intended. Witness contradicted Wilson and spoke to him in the highest terms of Jones.

Miss Mary Coleman, being sworn, stated that she was present when Wilson addressed himself to Mrs. Duff, and told her that Mrs. Bernard had sent money by Jones to pay her children's board, which he had never so applied—that he was sorry to hear that Jones was to be married to Miss Duff, as he was unworthy of her. In her cross examination, she said she was in no intimate acquaintance with Mr. Wilson than with Mrs. Duff.

Miss Ellen Kent testified that she had heard Mrs. Bernard tell Wilson in Philadelphia that she had sent money, to Jones three different times, to the amount of $30 to pay for children's board, and that when she arrived in Boston, she was sued for the money.

Samuel H. Hamilton was called, but his testimony was objected to by the plaintiff, and overruled.

On the part of the plaintiff, George P. Farrell stated that Mrs. Duff was cold in the extreme to Jones when they met on his return from Philadelphia.

Judge Irving charged the jury that, giving the name of Mrs. Bernard was a good justification, provided it were done in friendship, with good motives, and without malice. That, however, was a question for them to decide.

The jury found a verdict of one hundred dollars for the plaintiff—Nims and Goldsmith Attorneys.

GRUMBLING.

Thus it hath always been and e'er shall be,
Coheirsons in trade cannot agree.

COWPER.

Grumbling is just as essential to human nature as the forty seven senses are to the human body. Without it man could not exist, and oh! tell it not in Gath—"nor woman neither." It is precisely to the mind what food is to the system, or brandy to the jovial hearted. We grumble every day—and how delicious is the exercise! What an amiable perturbation of the spirits does it produce! What a roseate hue does it impart to the cheeks of beauty! What a classical volubility does it add to the tongue! A woman is never in a more interesting situation than when scolding her child or grumbling at her servant. A gentleman is never more like a lord than when railing at his wife. And here, be it remarked, that I opine grumbling is one of the most delicious consequences of the matrimonial connection. What husband, and what wife—to use a trite but expressive phrase—have never been at 'loggerheads?' Now they always grumble at one another just to have the pleasure of making friends—but other folks grumble just to enjoy the pleasure of grumbling. I know a man whose lips are imbued with eternal censure. It is the very pith of his being to get an opportunity to disgorge himself of the sarcasm, spleen and venom, which he feels towards the remainder of his race. He was never heard to approbate any thing or any body in his life—and yet while he can get persons to hear him grumble he is comparatively comfortable.

Grumbling, then, is not only a common habit, but it is one which affords relief to the mind. If A should tread upon the toes of B, the pain of the latter would be much mitigated by grumbling at him for the injury. If he also has shins against a stump is always much relieved by venting a hearty d——n at the unconscious cause of his damage. Mankind are prone to grumble.—When we go to church, we always find something at which to be infriendly. The prayer was too long, the sermon too mean, the singing too bad, or any other defect, which can be so properly discovered at the present day. If we hear a speech of any sort there is always some deficit about it either glaring or minute, and it is natural that we should point it out. A tailor promises to make us a coat, and fails. Now what could quicken his moral energies more than genteelly to grumble at him? The remedy for the evil, you see, is easy, and who among us has failed to apply it? A man promises to haul us a load of wood in cold weather, and neglects it. Now could human nature resist the temptation to grumble about it?—A debtor pledges himself to pay you within a given period, and upon the strength of his engagement with you, you enter into a contract with another. He cuits to pay you and your credit sinks. Now is there any thing more provoking?—When the mercury is ten degrees below zero, a parcel of unwelcome visitants crowd you out from your own fire. Now at what sort of conduct could you more reasonably murmur?—You fancy, perhaps, that your assiduous attentions have made a favorable impression upon the heart of some beautiful young lady, and before you are prepared to expect the blow, she jilts you. Now could Patience herself abstain from grumbling at such a defeat?—With but one dram in your bottle, your politeness induces you to offer it to your acquaintance, when you would like very well to take it yourself. He seizes the liquor, swallows it at a draught, smacks his lips, and looks as if he were in an extremely good humour. Did you never feel, on such an occasion, as if it would afford you a great satisfaction to knock him down?—You have emergent business to attend to, and just as you set about doing it, a long-winded long-tongued and endless gabbler, begins to surfeit you with his nonsense. Your civility compels you to attend to him—but don't you grumble about it afterwards?—Now these are the every day occurrences of life, and they show conclusively that grumbling is a quality inseparable from our existence. We grumble at a thousand things without knowing that we do so. We grumble at one another and grumble at ourselves; and if he were not a very particular and much respected friend and acquaintance, we would be disposed sometimes to grumble at the d——l.—Knoxville Register.

We understand that it is his intention to have a trial of skill with Kensett, the English Pugilist, who is now in training for that purpose. Many heavy bets depend upon the issue of this contest.'

Cuffing is all the fashion at the seat of Government; and we have no doubt that the Irish Champion will have plenty of pupils, if he opens an Academy for the tuition of public men.

IMPORTANT TO PALE LADIES—Monsieur Chabert, the Fire King, has presented to the world sundry valuable recipes, among which is a prescription for giving color to pallid cheeks without the aid of rouge or brick-dust. A little powdered cochineal, inclosed in a bag of thin linen, moistened and rubbed on the part affected, 'will produce a beautiful rosy color.' A lump of alum must be subsequently applied, to set the die, and then wipe 'with a handkerchief.' The same good results to the complexion, together with a roseate hue that neither alkali nor acid can eradicate, it is believed may be obtained from pure morning air, mixed with the spirit of cheerfulness.—Evening Journal.

FEMALE CELIBACY.—A woman may be not only respectable but happy, in celibacy. An imprudent marriage brings with it certain wretchedness. If she forms an alliance with an individual of bad habits, dissipated or drunken, ill-tempered or improvident, what are the chances of happiness? If he does not abuse, he will starve her: if he does not beat and torment her, he will degrade her from the rank she once occupied, and leave her to pine out her days in anguish and despair. Iconoclast, therefore, but think it better to prefer enduring the fabulous punishments of leading apes in hell to the 'sharp misery' of being chained to a demon on earth.

BANK ANECDOTE.—Many years since, a bookkeeper in one of the banks of our city, received a challenge from a person who kept an account with the bank, in consequence of the former having reported the latter as an overdrawer.

The book-keeper returned the challenge, with the following laconic note written upon it.

'The bank gives me for writing, but not for fighting.—U. S. Gaz.

THE CHOLERA.—An Arab flying from the plague at Alexandria, to seek refuge at Cairo, was overtaken by an old woman journeying to the same place, whom he recognized to be the plague herself—'A.?' said the man, 'you are going to kill every one at Cairo now?' 'No,' replied she,' I shall only kill three thousand.' Some time after, the traveller met this old woman again, when he said, 'You lied in promising to kill no more than three thousand at Cairo, you killed thirty.' 'You are wrong,' said she, I killed only three thousand—Fear killed the rest?—Sporting Mag.

THE DEVIL AND DR FAUSTUS.—The story of the Devil and Dr Faustus originated from the following circumstance. Faustus had printed a beautiful edition of the Bible, which was an exact imitation of the best manuscripts. He took a number and went to Paris, where he at first sold them for six and then for five hundred crowns each. At last he lowered his price to thirty crowns each, and all Paris was perplexed at the number of copies produced, and their exact uniformity. They accordingly believed that Faust had made a league with the Devil, and he was accused of being a magician, STEAM-BOAT RACING.—Opposition is certainly beneficial to the public, in every kind of business. It not only has been considered laudable even in steam-boat navigation—it has produced a public benefit in reducing the price of passage, in facilitating transportation, and in contributing to the ease and comfort of travellers. We well recollect of the time when the old north river monopoly compelled us to pay eight dollars for a passage, performed in twenty-four hours—now we pay only two dollars, and arrive in New-York after a trip of about ten hours. This we consider a saving of time and money, which would never have been realized, had that monopoly continued to exist.

But there are also very serious evils attending this competition; and none more disastrous than steamboat racing. Last season there were so many accidents, and so much injury sustained, that the public were prepared to expect that better regulations would be established at the opening of the navigation; but in this there was a great disappointment—for no sooner was an opposition boat alongside the wharf, than this detestable and dangerous practice of racing commenced. A practical illustration of this was exemplified on Monday night, about twenty miles above New York, when the Ohio, not being able to pass the De Witt Clinton, was deliberately forced upon the larboard side of the latter, and raked her from the stern to the wheelhouse; the entire loss of which would have been the inevitable consequence, had the new guards not prevented it—several gentlemen were thrown down upon deck by the shock, and one or two had a quite narrow escape.

Now, we say this is sporting altogether too much with the lives and limbs of the passengers. Is it possible for a person to lose one in his berth, when he is constantly exposed to the blowpoint of another boat? Why all this racing? What matters it whether one boat or the other arrives here or in New York five minutes first? Or should the short space of even ten minutes be gained, that is no evidence of superior facility, because many things might occur to her advantage besides actual speed.—Albany Microscope.

F. S. HILL.—This gentleman who made so successful a debut at the Richmond Hill Theatre, appeared before a Boston audience on Monday evening week, in the character of Romeo. The Daily Advertiser of the 26th, says 'The house was well filled, and received him with every token of favor and encouragement. His performance drew forth unqualified applause, and proved that he had not ventured on his new vocation, without a correct estimate of his own powers. Combining, as he does, with a graceful person and an excellent voice, literary talents of a high order, Mr Hill can hardly fail to attain a rapid eminence in his profession.' The Boston Centinel in a notice of the performance of that evening, thus speaks of Mr HILL. Although apparently somewhat embarrassed at first, he displayed considerable native power, and, on the whole, made a favorable impression: his reading was correct, and his action natural and appropriate. From a portion of the performance, which we had an opportunity of witnessing, it appeared that with close study and practice, he might expect to attain to eminence in his profession. 'On Tuesday evening, Mr Hill played Charles Austencourt, in Man and Wife. The Morning Post, says, 'he made a decided hit. 'His manner was entirely free from the embarrassment that was manifest in his performance on Monday evening, and he went through the part with all the freedom and ease of a veteran stager.'

CONSTABLES BEWARE.—The Paterson Intelligencer contains a notice from five of the justices of the peace in that town, making known their intention to publish, every three months, a list of the executions issued by them, which have remained in the hands of the officers more than thirty days. We like the idea vastly, as we think it will produce four good results. Imprimis—it will give some advertising patronage to the printers! 2d, it will appraise the public who have been sentenced to execution: 3d, it will afford the aforesaid justices an opportunity of making known how many suits have been submitted to their judgment, and last, it may quicken the officers in discharging their duty to avoid being printed. Very probably we might, by poking dog an search, find other reasons equally good, but we take those which we have already given to be quite sufficient.—Newark Mer. Adv.

QUACKERY.—Two men died recently by taking an over dose of the essence of watercress in a glass of spruce beer at the shop of an Indian root doctor in the Sixth avenue: one died in ten hours and the other in fourteen hours. It is said a young man has died since in the same way. Two families, consisting of twelve or fourteen persons are thus deprived of their principal means of support by, to say the least, great carelessness. Half an ounce or an ounce of this essence was taken by each of these persons.—Daily Sentinel.

An insensibility to the beauties of nature, an incapability to discover what there is to admire in creation, and an indisposition to adore the Great First Cause, are most sure marks of an uncultivated mind, and an unrefined imagination. To him whose intellectual powers are accustomed to active exercise in the appreciation and admiration of the wonders of the natural world, it is deemed one of the greatest blessings vouchsafed by heaven, that his abilities are suited to such an exalted employment.

Caustic abuse is much better than the old method of monotonous puffery. Rouse the literary world with a rattling peal of thunder, and they will ask who makes the noise, if they do no more. There is nothing like an occasional shake in music, and in literature, it shows the operators to be all 'alive and kicking.'

NATURAL AFFINITY.—An outside passenger by one of the Manchester and London coaches, had his hat blown over a bridge, and carried away by the stream. 'Is it not very singular,' said he to a gentleman who was seated beside him, 'that my hat should take that direction?' 'Not at all,' replied the latter, it is but natural that a beaver should take to the water.'

SHAKING HANDS.—At a duel, the parties discharged their pistols without effect; whereupon, one of the seconds interfered, and proposed that the combatants should shake hands. To this, the other second objected, as unnecessary; for, said he, their hands have been shaking this half hour.

The London Times says: 'It is reported currently that Mr. Kean Jr. and Clara Fisher have been united in America, and are on their way home with the rewards of their professional toil.'

Pity 'tis that the report is not true. What a dear, delightful family of lisping children might be the issue of such a marriage. Pa and Ma all over.

SINGULAR.—A few days ago says the Adam's Mass. Gazette while a decanter of rum was standing in Mr Wilbur's bar, the stopple of which suddenly cracked into six pieces, and fell upon the shelf, without any apparent cause; no person stood within several paces of the bottle, and the report was heard a number of rods. Is not this a prognostication of the success of the Young People's Temperance Society.'

BOATING OVER LAND.—This would be rather a tedious process, people would say,—and they are right—but we have seen it done. The flood which occurred here this spring, carried several boats out of the canal and deposited them where they now lay high and dry on the meadows. One of these,—a large lake boat,—was left on the middle of the flats, west of this city, some hundred of yards from the canal: and to make it of more use to the owner, it must be taken into 'navigable waters.' To effect this, a patent stump extractor was employed by means of which it was drawn along very easily, seven or eight feet at a batch, to the bank of the canal—and will soon be set by and simply deposited in the big ditch.—Schenectady Whig.

FACTORY KINDNESS.—A girl in a factory in Dunstable, N. H. not long since applied to a Mr. Marshall, an overseer in the mill, for liberty to go and see a brother who had come from a distance, and whom she had not seen in some time; and who was waiting to meet her. Liberty was refused her to go that day, but promised her for next morning. But morning came, and liberty was still refused; and she was told that if she went, she should be discharged. Her desire to meet her brother prevailed, and she went out for that purpose; but, on her return, she was promptly discharged: she was a respectable girl.

HISTORY OF VERMONT.—Chauncey Goodrich, of Poultney, Vt., has in the press a history of Vermont, from its early history to the present time, written by Zadock Thompson, A. M. the author of the Gazetteer of that state, and editor of the Green Mountain Repository.

The following beautiful extract is selected from a speech delivered by JAMES WILSON, L. L. D. Professor of law in the University of Pennsylvania, in the year 1790, in the presence of General WASHINGTON, and a large concourse of ladies and gentlemen.

In the European temple of fame, WILLIAM PENN, is placed by the side of Lycurgus. Will America refuse a temple to her legislators and her heroes? No, she will not. The glorious dome already rises. Its architecture is of the neatest, and chastest order; its dimensions are spacious; its proportions are elegant, and correct. In its front, a number of niches are formed. In some of them statues are placed. On the left hand of the portal, are the names and figures of Warren, Montgomery, and Mercer. On the right hand are the names and figures of Calvert, Penn, and Franklin. In the middle is a niche, of larger size, and decorated with peculiar ornaments. On the left side of it, are sculptured the trophies of war. On the right, the more precious emblems of peace. Above it, is represented the rising glory of the United States. It is without a statue, and without a name. Beneath it, in letters very legible, are these words, 'For the most Worthy.' By the acceptance voice of grateful America,—with the consenting plaudits of an admiring world, the designation is unanimously made. Late—very late may the niche be filled.'

MATRIMONY.—Mrs E. Montague, in her letters, says, 'I can define matrimonial happiness only like wit, by negative,—'Tis not kissing, that's too sweet; 'tis not scolding, that's too sour; 'tis not raillery, that's too bitter; nor is it the continual shuttlecock of reply, for that's too tart. In short, I hardly know how to season it exactly to my taste; but I would neither have it tart nor mawkishly sweet. I should not like to live entirely either upon Metheglin or verjuice.' Again she says, 'I fancy in matrimony one finds variety in the charming vicissitudes of—

'Sometimes my plague, sometimes my darling;
Kissing to-day, to-morrow snarling.'

LONDON PAPERS.—The official account of stamps issued to newspapers, shows the circulation of the several Newspapers, which is made by selling the copies, and not by subscription, as in this country. The Courier sold in 1830, 3,409,966 papers. In 1831, 4,328,025, an increase attributed to the extension of the principles of Reform. The John Bull has gone ahead of the Age. Cobbett and the Farmer's Journal are on the decline. The Morning Post, opposed to Reform, sells but 2,000 copies a day.

SNUFF TAKING.—Some profound arithmetician being at a loss for something to do, has calculated that every snuff taker, who has continued this practice for 40 years—has dedicated two entire years of his life to taking snuff—and two more in blowing his nose!

BORROWING NEWSPAPERS.—Frequent complaints are made to us concerning newspaper borrowers. Some folks not well grounded in ethical rules are never disposed to pay for a newspaper while they can borrow of their neighbors. This economy is neither of the most liberal or most laudable character. The disposition it evinces is a creeping mouse-like disposition. Perhaps we lack charity towards newspaper borrowers—no matter—they deprive us of what is equivalent to our meat, drink and substance. They consider not the rule of something for something, or fancy there can be no property in a newspaper abstracted from the mere right to the material upon which it is printed. This doctrine is neither founded in law or equity. To borrow a newspaper is at variance with the divine precepts, 'Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsars,' 'The laborer is worthy of his hire, &c!' 'Muzzle not the Ox nor the Ass that treadeth out the corn,' &c. &c. We have been informed repeatedly that a Gentleman who discontinued a few months ago, has ever since been in the habit of taking a neighboring subscriber's paper frequently before the owner reads it himself. Now this is wrong—it is worse—it is at once intrusive and dishonest, highly annoying to our subscriber, and palpably unjust towards ourselves. Fair play is said to be a jewel, and live and let live the golden maxim of the upright man. Indeed we should prefer sending a few numbers gratis to all such as above alluded to, provided they will promise not to borrow from their neighbors.—Miners Journal.

NINETEENTH OF APRIL, '75.—The week we have just closed was one of stormy interest to Massachusetts, especially this part of it, fifty seven years since. Thursday, the 19th of April, was the fifty seventh anniversary of the memorable battles of Lexington and Concord. The generation that fought them are gone; but the impressions made on the few surviving witnesses, were too deep and lively, to be effaced by any thing but death. On the morning of that auspicious, but then gloomy day, citizens were suddenly called from their fields, workshops, and counting houses, to meet in arms an enemy, then on the march into the heart of their country. None hesitated, although all well knew that, if they escaped death in the field, the penalties for treason would await them, should their cause prove unsuccessful. The occasion required the physical bravery of a common soldier, and the moral courage of a hero, and both were exhibited. Militia as they were, they defended, as they always will, their own soil, and compelled the best troops of England to a hasty and inglorious retreat. The first blood shed in America, in defence of liberty, was shed on that day, near our homes. The impulse then given, carried the country through a seven years perilous war, to the establishment of its independence; nor did it stop here, but extended across the Atlantic and is now operating in the nations that combined to oppress us, as well as in the more gallant nation that came to our assistance. Heaven grant them wisdom duly to appreciate and regulate it, and if needful to control its excess.—New England Galaxy.

ANTS.—A story is related by Prevost of an Italian missionary, resident in Congo, who was awakened by his negroes in great alarm at the house being invaded by an immense army of ants, which poured in like a flood, and before he could rise had already mounted upon his legs. They covered the floor and passages, forming a stratum of considerable depth. Nothing but fire was capable of arresting their progress. He states that cows have been known to be devoured in their stalls by these daring devastators. Smith, in his voyage to Guinea, reports that at Cape Corse the castle was attacked by legions of ants, who were preceded by thirty or forty, apparently acting as guides. It was at daybreak when they made this incursion, entering first by a chapel on the floor of which some negro servants were lying. 'Assailed by this new enemy, they fled with precipitation, and gave the alarm to their master, who, on awaking, could hardly recover from his astonishment at beholding the advancing multitude, which extended for a quarter of a mile before him. There was not much time for deliberation; and a happy expedient was adopted of putting a long train of gunpowder across the line of their march, and extending it to their flanks, which had already begun to deploy, and, setting fire to the whole, millions were destroyed at one blow; which so intimidated the rest, that the whole army retreated in disorder, and did not renew the attack.

Descriptions of ant-hills of immense size abound in books of travellers who have visited tropical regions. Mr. Campbell observed in the district of Albany, at the Cape of Good Hope, an ant-hill, five feet high, and twelve in circumference. In the forests of Guinea, it is stated, that they may be found from fifteen to twenty feet in height; and, that, when viewed from a distance on these widely extended savannas, they resemble the rude huts of the savages; but they contain a race more ferocious than the savage or the tiger himself, and cannot be approached by men without the utmost danger of being devoured.—Blakes Juvenile Encyclopedia.

TO OUR PATRONS.

Our readers will pardon us for thus again obtruding ourselves upon their notice, but we take advantage of the acknowledged license of editors to puff themselves whenever any change in their plan affords a pretext for the egotism. Owing to the kind indulgence of our friends and patrons, we shall be enabled, at some additional expense, to enlarge and much improve the appearance of our sheet; and we avail ourselves of the occasion, to tender them our grateful thanks for the liberal support and indulgence they have ever been so ready to bestow upon our efforts, to render this paper, the only similar publication in the Union, worthy of themselves and of the patronage of the community. We are fully sensible, that up to this time, we have been unable to do justice to our readers—or to our object, but we are equally sensible that we have gathered wisdom from experience, and that by the reception of the best foreign and native periodicals; and by the benefit always to be derived from an excellent exchange and valuable correspondents, we have it in our power to present our readers in future, a paper more useful and entertaining, and more entirely deserving their present liberal support.

It has afforded us the utmost pleasure to note abroad the increasing respect and good feeling shown us by a number of our cotemporaries. Entertaining a grateful sense of this kindness we beg of them severally to accept the expression of our sincere and hearty good wishes for their health and success.

To the trouble consequent upon our removal, and the necessity we were under, after putting up our press, of cutting a hole in the ceiling for the reception of the "frisket," a circumstance somewhat mortar-fying,—must be ascribed the want of method in our paper of to-day. We have presented our readers with no "criminal reports," which, to say the least, is not very civil of us; and independent of that, we have a large quantity of "raw material," on hand which, as friends of a moderate Tariff, we are well aware ought to have been "manufactured." We beg our friends, however, to consider this as a mere episode in the history of our paper, and to believe, if they "forgive us this time, we'll never do so any more."

MAY-DAY IN NEW-YORK.

MAY-DAY is no holiday dependent on the rubric, or the musty fables of monks and saints—it is a jubilee of Nature's own appointing, when the earth, dressing herself up in flowers and green garlands, calls aloud to her children to come out into the fields and participate in her merry-making; a glad some invitation which has been accepted with sparkling eyes and happy hearts since the world itself was young. To go a Maying is not less healthy to the spirit than the frame; it is a reprieve from the thraldom of cities and artificial life, and rubs the canker of care from our hearts, by sending them out among the green leaves. It enables the plodders and the sons of toil to shake hands with nature; and as they pluck the blossomy bough amid freshness and fragrance, and the music of birds and the sounds of human happiness, it brings them into direct and grateful communion with Him, whom they have been too apt to view through the medium of gloomy or mysterious abstractions.

But, alas! for May-day in New-York! Our pen and our courage both shrink from describing it; we will only say that on Wednesday last we saw a certain gentleman in a thread-bare coat,—"a servant of the muses," as you might have known by his livery—address an elderly, grave-looking individual, with a bill of lading in one hand, and a shipping list in the other, and moving his lips in some deep calculation to himself. We were in time to overhear the following conversation:

Poet.—Are you for the country to day?

Merchant.—I would attend you with pleasure, sir, if I thought it would give me a good appetite for my dinner; but you must know that I am moving, and beside, I cannot possibly be absent from Wall-street.

Poet.—I am quite aware of that;—but how do you mean to manage after death? or do you imagine that the grim king will put up his scythe in its scabbard, and walk down stairs again, if you assure him that you are positively engaged to meet your broker at four o'clock? How you must envy the steeple of St. Paul's, which keeps its happy station night and day, holidays and Sundays! Why, the pauper who scrapes the mud off the high road, is less of a drudge than you, who are incessantly scraping up gold. His body is not half so much exposed to annoyance as your mind; and when his day's labor is done, and his appetites satisfied he falls asleep without thinking of the morrow; whereas your head is perpetually at work; you can hardly sleep, from the fear of losing what you have got; and so far from your cravings being appeased by plenty, you are everlastingly hungering and thirsting for more.

Mer.—There you are mistaken: for as soon as I have completed a plum, I mean to retire to a box in the country.

Poet.—My most solvent friend, you may deceive yourself, but you cannot deceive me. You will no more be satisfied with one plum in your second childhood than you were in your first;—there is but one box to which you will ever retire, and into that you will be screwed down, narrow as it is, with all your mortgages, title deeds, bank stock and bullion into the bargain, so you may as well make holiday while you can and follow me. Good day!

Mer.—Canting fool! to affect to place riches in the scale of good things, below learning.

The merchant was right. In our mind, money and knowledge stand to each other in the relation of cause and effect. How many persons could we cite, if we chose to be personal, who were formerly of no account whatever in the world, and whom a "lucky hit" has qualified for sitting in committees on the most abstruse matters of political interest! How many Poets could we name, who derive their title to that appellation exclusively from the means of paying their printer! Horace, indeed, has touched this point with his usual smartness and perspicuity of remark. "Ego," says he,

> "Vegnio ne stodium SINE DIVITE VENA
> Nec run is quod pavet video ingenium."

which, we conceive, to be thus literally translated—

> "'Tis money gives a force to argument,
> And your true genius lies in—six per cent."

But stop; there is our Poet again talking to a young lady, and by our faith, a very pretty and genteel one into the bargain. Let us listen.

Poet.—"Love whose month is ever May," is a phrase of Shakspeare's, no uninitiated investigators of the human heart; but he meant the May of the country—not the season of fashion and dissipation in the city, where the young men are too much absorbed by ambition or avarice to feel any kindly expansion of the affections. Will you not join me in my rambles?

Lady.—Certainly not. What would people say! besides, we are very busy to-day, and this evening we are to see Miss Hughes.

Poet.—Come with me, and you shall see a Theatre millions of times more lofty and magnificent, and painted as well as illuminated by the hand of Heaven. Ay, and I will show you a Princess too, which you cannot behold in Massaniello; and the gems of her crown, of Flora's own manufacture, shall be more curious and beautiful than all the jewellers of the world can produce; our musicians shall hover over us upon wings—and our feast——

Lady.—Good morning, Sir!—the man's mad.

We inclined to the same opinion; and returned to our office, after witnessing certain "moving accidents," as Othello calls them, to indue the above article, and send it to the press "with all its imperfections on its head."

'One of these was somewhat amusing—a pair of fine horses, with a "part and parcel," or rather a fraction of a carriage attached to them, rushed, like lightning whipped up, through Chatham square, and having a very laudable partiality for household furniture, sprang amid a collection of it in front of Mr. Healey's store, where, for a few moments, they had every thing

> "Like an Ape in a China Shop, all their own way."

After "fairly turning the TABLES" upon themselves, they were "amid the wreck of matter and the crush of fect" caught, secured, and prevented from "moving."

A TOLL-ERABLE GOOD ONE.—On Tuesday evening last, a horse, belonging to one of our subscribers, started from Brooklyn, run the toll, and jumped into the river. After several attempts to take him out, he was left to himself, when he immediately up helm, shaped his course for this city, and was extricated at one of the slips, by a watchman, under rather "unfavorable horse-pices" He will probably waive such proceedings for the future.

VIPER-OUS ACT. A man in Kentucky lately discharged another, whom he had hired to kill snakes, because the laborer was unable to accomplish the death of more than two and a half cords per day—three cords being considered a day's work. The employer should have remembered what "crooked sticks" his servant had to deal with before he placed him in such a 'coil.'

PRINTERS AND AUTHORS.

It is the printer who consummates an author's conceptions. He gives to "airy nothings a local habitation and a name." Without the compositor and printer's devil, what a poor dreaming, fruitless, futile thing, is a wit. He is a soul without a body—a soldier, with plenty of courage, and no sword—a lawyer, with brass and black letter, and no cause—a parson, brim-full of divinity, without a pulpit—a statesman, well read in Machiavel and Locke, without a voice at Washington. An author in MS. is a half fledged sloven, unseemly to look upon; but, when turned out from the various hands, who conspire to dress and powder him for the public, what an Adonis he walks forth! what a typographical dandy! when the happy wight has gone through the beautifying hands of the compositor, devil, printer, sewer, and boarder, then and then only, does he become fit to meet the embrace of fair hands, and to lounge gracefully on the commode in the boudoirs of Broadway. Pope was a driveller when he said criticism was the muses handmaid. The lines should be

> The printer then the muses handmaid prov'd
> To dress her charms and make her more belov'd.

DANCING.

For some thousand of years dancing was exclusively a religious ceremony. The dance of the Jews, established by the Levitical law to be exhibited at their solemn feasts, is, perhaps, the most ancient upon record. The dancing of David is also frequently quoted; and many commentators have thought that every Psalm was accompanied by a distinct dance. In several of the temples, a stage was specially erected for these exercises; but in process of time, they seem to have been practised by secular, as well as spiritual performers. The daughters of Shiloh were thus receiving themselves in the vineyards, when they were caught by the young men of the tribe of Benjamin, who presently danced into their good graces and carried them off for wives—a process, which is frequently imitated even in these degenerate days. The heathens also could "sport a toe," in the very earliest ages. Pindar calls Apollo "the dancer." Homer in one of his hymns, tells us that this deity "cut a pigeon a wing" to the music of his own harp; and from Callimachus we learn, that the Nereides were proficients in this elegant accomplishment, at the early age of nine years. For several centuries it was confined to military movements, when a battle was a grand ballet of action, opposing armies became partners in the dance of death, and cut throats and capers with equal assiduity. Since those truculent and operatic days, it has been limited to festive and joyous occasions. But how various the estimation in which it has been held by inconsistent mortals! Socrates, a wise Grecian, took lessons in this art from Aspasia. Cicero, an enlightened Roman, urges the practice of dancing against Galbinius as a grave and heinous offence. Of the moderns many signalize the sabbath by an increased hilarity of heel; while others maintain, that as many paces as a man makes in dancing so many leaps he makes towards hell. Let us hope that the increasing good sense of these well-meaning, but misguided ascetics, will speedily get the better of such monkish austerities; that the time may come when they may feel persuaded that our Maker can contemplate this innocent recreation of his creatures, with as much benignity as a parent beholds the gambols of his children; and that the change may be justified by adopting the beautiful sentiment of Addison, "Cheerfulness is the best Hymn to the Deity."

MAY DAY has come and passed since our last publication, and with it the bustle, the confusion and the turmoil so inseparably connected in the mind as in New-York with the idea of the recurrence of this elsewhere joyous anniversary—so celebrated in poetry, as a day of flowers and festivity, not as an era of universal tumult and vexation. It has passed, with its heavy catalogue of fatigue-duties to servants, golden harvests to porters and trans-porters of all sorts, miseries huge and innumerable to gentlemen idlers, and sad inconveniences to every body; and our streets have resumed their wonted orderly though business-like aspect, and the lounger again ventures to inhale the air freely, even in our great thoroughfares, without imbibing more than a healthy proportion (say one fourth) of pure dust by the operation.—But it befits neither our vocation nor our purpose to waste time in the narration of events and matters already within the cognizance of every casual observer nor even in moralizing upon them.—Our present intent is rather to detail some of the catastrophies and "dire mishaps" which have grown out of the emigrating and renovating mania with which our good citizens are so universally afflicted at each return of the unlucky period alluded to; and to do this we have but to select from the pile of epistles, some plaintive, others humorous, with which we have been favored in relation to this subject. The following is the first which comes to hand, and the affair which it relates, is a "moving accident" in more senses than one.

Hudson street, May 3, 1832.

MESSRS. EDITORS:

Hear me you shall, pity me you must, while I proceed to give a short account of the dread calamities which this vile habit of turning the whole city upside down, 'tother side out, and wrong side before, on the first of May has brought down on my devoted head.

You must know that, having resided but a few months in your city, I was totally ignorant of the existence of said custom—so, in the morning of the eventful and to me disastrous day, I rose, according to immemorial usage, at the dying away of the last faint echo of the breakfast bell, and soon found myself seated over my coffee, and my good landlady exercising her powers of volubility (no weak ones) apparently to my behalf, but so deep was the reverie in which my half-awakened brain was then engaged, that I did not catch a single idea from the whole of her discourse. I smiled, and said, "Yes, ma'am," "Certainly ma'am," at each pause; and having speedily despatched my breakfast, sallied immediately out, and proceeded to attend to the business which engrossed my mind. Dinner-time came, but no time for dinner, and it was late in the night before I was at liberty to wend my way, over wheel-barrows, barrels, and all manner of obstructions, towards my boarding house. All here was still; but by the help of my night keys, I soon introduced myself to my chamber, dreaming of nothing but sweet repose; when, horrible to relate! my ears were instantaneously saluted by a most piercing female shriek, proceeding exactly from my own bed, or at least from the place where it should have been; and scarcely had sufficient time elapsed for my hair to bristle on my head, before the shriek was answered by the loud vociferations of a ferocious mastiff in the kitchen beneath, and re-echoed by the outcries of half a dozen inmates of the house, and these again succeeded by the rattle of the watchman; and the next moment there was a round dozen of them (besides the dog) at my throat, all commanding me to tell them instantly what the devil all this meant.

"You do well to ask that," said I, as soon as I could speak, "after falling upon me in this fashion in my own chamber."

"O take him off," said the one who assumed to be the master of the house; perhaps he's not a thief after all; but, being a little too tipsey for starlight, he has made a mistake in trying to find his lodgings—and in spite of all my remonstrances, I was forthwith marched off to the watch-house, to pass the remainder of the night. In the morning, I narrowly escaped commitment on the charge of "burglary with intent to steal," (I verily believe it would have gone hard with me if the witnesses could have been got there at that unseasonable hour,) and I was finally discharged with a solemn admonition to guard for the future, against intoxication, (think of that, sir, for a member of the cold water society!)

I spent the next day in unravelling the mystery; and found that my landlord had removed his goods and chattels to another part of the city on the established day, supposing me to be previously acquainted and satisfied with his intention of so doing, and another family had immediately taken his place; of which changes my unlucky absence of mind and absence from dinner had kept me ignorant; and thus had I been led blindfold into a "comedy (or rather tragedy) of errors."

UNFURNISHED LODGINGS CONSUMED. A dandy, so says the N. O. Emporium, fell into the fire, and being unable to rise, his head was entirely consumed—luckily there was nothing in it of value.—The Editor calls it "a fortunate escape," it was a "hair breadth" one, at any rate.

Mopsa. Is the tale true think ye?

Peddlar. Very true; and not above a month old—here are five Justices hands to it, and more witnesses than my pack will hold. Why should I carry lies?

SHAKSPEARE.

The story in our last, says the Concord Patriot, of an expedition beyond the Rocky Mountains, turns out to be a hoax, played off upon the people of Ohio by a wooden nutmeg pedlar from Connecticut.

Clown. There are of these pedlers, that have more in 'em than you'd think, Sister.

SHAKSPEARE.

NEW COUNTERFEITS.

Three dollar bills of the Bank of Orange County were put in circulation yesterday. The bills are well executed except the face, which is very bad—the paper is darker than the genuine notes. They are marked A. a. dated 3d Oct. 1831, and signed Jn. Smith, President, W. Seward, Cash.

A new counterfeit three dollar note, on the Scituate Mass. Bank, has been put in circulation. They are letter B. payable to B. Matherson, dated 1st May, 1827, signed D. M. Harris, Cashier, Jos. Wesloft, President. The whole appearance of the note is bad, particularly the engraving, which is very coarse.

EXTRAORDINARY DISEASE.—"I'm sorry your cousin Sullivan is dead: a decent man he was ever always. And now tell me, what did he die of?" "He died of a Tuesday."

Original and Selected.

TREE HILL RACES—1st of May.

The Racing over this old course this spring will be unusually attractive, says the Richmond Whig. All the stables are expected to centre there, and selecting their best from previous trials, may well serve to amuse and delight those that can devote a few days to the noble and exhilirating recreation of the Turf.

It is rare in the annals of Racing, a sweepstake like the first day's can be presented to the public. Important in its consequences to the breeder, it affords much interest to the amateur. There are six entries, play or pay, hence "no cold blooded delay," no giving back, but front to front, each has to fight it out, and "must stand the hazard of the die." Descendants of Gohanna, enriched by a long line of noble ancestry—Tonson, the gallant steed that never failed his rider.—Medley, the conquerer of Ariel, the pride of the turf—Eclipse, the Champion of the North—Arab, as fleet as his name purports—and Contention, himself "the sire of a hundred Kings," must contend in gallant shew and formidable array for the honor and fame of their fathers.

The second day, besides an interesting sweepstake, will be run for the Proprietor's Purse, 2 mile heats; and when it is known Andrew, Clifford, Annette, Gemima, Traffic, Pamunkey, Rapid, Trifle, Betsy Hare, Lady Washington, &c. will be there, who can doubt but sport must follow?

The third day comes off the Jockey Club Purse of $1000, 4 mile heats, and there will be the beautiful and victorious Bonnets O'Blue; but

> "Hop'n though hence unsettl'd to go!
> No, by St. Bride of Bothwell, no."—

for there, too, will be Sally Hornet, Garrison's Splendid, 4 years old, Bayard, Collier, Maria West, Sparrovhawk, Molly Howell, Mohawk, &c., fearful odds, though backed by the judgement of Johnson and the fame of "the gray mare."

On the fourth day, is a sweepstake purse worth $1,800, and many colts of fine promise named. Also, on the same day, a Proprietor's Purse, 2 mile heats, free for any age, and from the unprecedented number of fine horses in training, good, very good sport may be expected. The respectability of this Club, not inferior to any ever raised in the world, offers the best warrant and guarantee, for the decorous manner in which the sports of the Turf are conducted. Here beauty lends her facination—here the Lawyer, forgetting the rights of meum and tuum, without fee or reward, snatches an hour from thought. The Doctor throws away the Pill Box, and the old settled Farmer, with hands uplifted and mouth expanded, grasps tight his pocket book, and wonders at all he sees. Could not our politicians in the city of Washington devote a few days to the sports of Tree Hill? It would take many a wrinkle from the brow, and be a healing balm to a vexed and troubled mind. If President Jackson could see the Bonnets o'Blue, Bayard and Sally Hornet, with Collier at their heels, streaking it down the quarter stretch, he would think no more of the rejection of Van Buren: Calhoun would forget State Rights, and Clay, in an ecstacy of delight, would send the American System to the Devil. Many are there, that Richmond would be glad to see—no party—no feeling but that of honorable, high minded gentlemen, met together in good fellowship. All hands will bid you welcome, and whilst we cannot give you splendor, we will try and give you fun.

FAIRFIELD COURSE.

This old and famous Course, says the Richmond Whig, has been revived after 17 years suspension. The concourse of people on the occasion was very large. We understand Wisfree's Gohanna colt won, and was sold for $3000 on the spot.

Fairfield Spring Meeting, April 24.

Yesterday's was a beautiful race on the Fairfield Course—Handicap Purse $200—mile heats, best three in five. It was finely contested. White's Traffic was the conqueror, beating Davis' Dolly Dixon, and W. R. Johnson's Clifford.

SAVANNAH RACES.

The amusement of the week (April 23d) was closed on Saturday by a race, one mile heats, the best three in five for the purse of $100 and the gate money of the day, which elicited the handsomest and most interesting running yet seen on the course. There were four animals started—Mr. Wallace's mare Patsey, 2 years old; Mr. Haun's Sir William, 2 years old, that won the purse of the day previous; Sir Bennett's Red gauntlet, 3 years old; and Mr. Winkler's Nick sades, 5 years old, who came in after a pretty run after the order named. (Patsey ahead about two lengths, Jersey 4 Shiloh's who lasted. Time 1m. 58s.

The second heat was also well run, and was again won by Patsey, by about a length in advance of Redgauntlet, Sir William coming in last. Time 1m. 58s.

The odds were now in favor of the mare who had evinced speed and unexpected bottom which, however, were put to the test by the jockeying Regulator, who by a determined effort won this the third heat by hardly more than a foot. Sir William again coming in last. Time 1m. 58s.

The last named was now out and the 5th cut was beautifully run by the other two, Regulator leading and winning. Time 1m. 58s.

The fifth and decisive heat, notwithstanding its importance, was two miles completed without any effort on either side, and it was only in the latter part that the struggle was made, in which Patsey was triumphant, coming in half a length ahead of [illegible]. Time 3m. 58s.

The very commendable zeal of the Savannah Jockey Club has by no means been thus successfully exhausted, as it is currently reported through, or proper to add, we presume, be taken to enlarge the purses and so fill the time so as to connect it with that of other Clubs in this State, and the annual Charleston races in February; and thereby secure the attendance of horses of note from abroad.

MR. ALEXANDER CUMMINGS, of Fell's Point, is employed in building a handsome Fishing Boat for a gentleman in this city, to be engaged during the summer season in the sports of angling. She is to be called the "Sporting Star"—will be a model of beauty and speed unequalled.

THE DRAMA.

PARK.

Miss Hughes has been the leading attraction at this house, "made venerable by time," for the last few days. It is said a new piece has been brought out in the course of the week, but we have been so "used up" by "moving accidents," that we have not had leisure as yet to see it.

AMERICAN.

We learn with pleasure that Mr. Hamblin, the able and judicious Manager of the American Theatre, has obtained a renewal of his lease of the House for four years from the 1st of Sept. next. He will now be enabled without risk to be still more liberal in catering for the tastes of our theatre-going community. He has our best, heartiest wishes for himself and his establishment.

We have neither time nor room to speak of the amusements of the week at this House, though they have been of a high character, but make way for a Correspondent, who furnishes us with the following pretty jeu d'esprit of

MISS VINCENT.

Nothing is now talked of in New-York but Miss Vincent, the new actress. If you go out to dinner, and are in the act of passing from the drawing room to the dining room, arm-in-arm with a lady, you are invariably asked if you have seen Miss Vincent: if you enter a glover's shop in Broadway, nothwithstanding the oppression of your elbow in the pit of his stomach, the vender of doe-skin finds breath enough to inquire how you like Miss Vincent: if walking onwards to Pine-street you endeavor to ascertain from your solicitor the state of the law-suit in which you are engaged, the managing clerk asks, how you like Miss Vincent in Juliet; and if descending into Wall-street, you desire your shoemaker to make your new pumps rather easier than their predecessors, he doubts whether Miss Vincent's Amanthis be equal to Miss Duff's. It is probable then, that on Monday night, when "this starry beauty doth beset our track," it will require some little sagacity to get either in or out of the house. We hope so, because, though by no means a finished actress, she is full of nature and feeling, and in her Juliet, gives herself entirely up to the impressions of the part—loses her power over herself—is led away by her feelings to an expression of stupor or artless joy—borrows beauty from deformity—charms unconsciously, and seems to think as little of the audience, as the fawn that wounded comes to drink, or the flower that droops in the sun, or wags its sweet head in the gale. If she takes pains to improve the powers she possesses, and confides implicitly in the suggestions and impulses of nature, she will take her stand on the "house top;" but when there, she must give up all the quiet comforts of home, and the quiet company of her own happy thoughts. She must exchange moonlight meditations for morning rehearsals—solitary echoes of her own fancies for the noisy applauses of a public theatre—and (worst of all!) imaginary love-vows for real newspaper criticisms. She knows best whether the change will be for the better. L.

BURIAL PLACE OF ROMEO AND JULIET.—The cemetery in which the ashes of these renowned lovers jointly reposed at (Verona,) was long ago destroyed by the falling of a thunderbolt into an adjoining magazine of combustibles; and the stone coffin in which Juliet was placed by the friar, after she had swallowed the sleeping draught, is the only relic now to be seen. It is marked by a striking for the head, two holes for the admission of air, and a place for the reception of a lighted taper, which is still the custom to fix beside the corpse. Till within the last few years it was placed with in the vestry of the convent ry, which had contained the actual tomb; but, in consequence of the many depredations committed by these who, in the light fingered, sealed the walls, for the purpose of carrying away a chip of the love stone, it was removed to a yard close by—a safe, but not unworthy place.—Library of the fine Arts.

Mrs. Norton is engaged in writing an Opera, for which a young lady, hitherto unknown in the musical world, is to furnish the music. It is said to display more originality than the "Siege of the Bon Mots."

SENTENCE OF MINA.

Doylestown, May 1st 1832. This morning, on the opening of the court, the counsel of Mina filed reasons for a new trial; which the court directed to be immediately discussed.

The reasons, embracing various objections to the evidence of High Constable Blaney, were argued by Mr. Rush, for the prisoner; when the court, after a full and attentive hearing of the counsel, delivered their opinion, and refused the application for a new trial.

Mina was then, about noon, brought into court,—he entered calm and firm, and confirmed for a few minutes with apparent composure with his counsel. Being asked why sentence of death should not be passed on him, his counsel Mr. M'Dowell read to the court a letter, written in English by Mina, addressed to the Judge. This letter earnestly entreated of him time to prepare for death and to see his family; and its peculiar and solemn phraseology made it most interesting, and not a little affecting to many of the multitude assembled. The presiding Judge, in much agitation and distress, then passed the sentence of the law upon the prisoner—That he should be hanged by the neck until he was dead, adding the hope of God's mercy for him. The miserable man appeared to suffer terribly at the close of this scene.

The following is genuine—no fabrication. At a crowded lecture the other evening, a young lady standing at the door of the church was address'd by an honest Hibernian, who was in attendance in the vestry, with "Indeede Miss I should be glad to give you a seate, but the empty ones are all full."

JUDICIAL DIGNITY.—There was lately a felon in jail in the County in Erie county, in the state of N. York, from the absence of the Judges, one of them being engaged in the lobby at Albany, and the other having hired himself out as journeyman grocer, to attend to some black cattle to Philadelphia.—Litchfield Enquirer.

FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

OUTER DRESS.—It is composed of gros d'orient, of a new shade of blue, called blue Amelie; the corsage is cut very low; it is square and plain behind, and arranged in deep folds in front, which are looped in the centre of the bust by large pearls, and drawn low; a blond lace guimp shades the bosom in a very delicate manner. A full ruche of plain blond encircles the back and shoulders. The sleeves are a la Maintenon, very short and full, and almost concealed by manchettes divided into three parts, and trimmed with blond lace. The hair is parted on the forehead, lightly blowed at the sides of the face, and arranged behind in short, full bows, which do not rise above the summit of the head. A circlet of gold and emeralds is the only ornaments of the coiffure. The jewelry worn with the dress should correspond.

EVENING DRESS.—It is of white crape over white satin; the corsage is low, but not so low as they are worn in general—rounded at the top, and setting close to the figure; a rose-coloured satin stomacher of a small size, and ornamented with white silk acorns, forms the shape in a very graceful manner. Beret sleeves, with blond lace jockeys; there are two falls arranged in the form of a shell. The skirt is trimmed with a single deep flounce, disposed in round plaits, and surmounted by a rich but light embroidery in white floss silk. In the centre of the flounce is a rose colored satin point, corresponding with the stomacher and ornamented in a similar manner with white silk acrons. The hair is disposed in corkscrew ringlets on the forehead, and twisted in a Grecian knot behind. A boquet of white ostrich feathers, in the centre of which is one of rose color, is placed behind the knot: the feathers mingle with the hair, and droop in different directions over it. Brooch of pearls and emeralds.

BALL DRESS.—A rose-coloured gauze de Turin dress over white gros de Naples; corsage a la Maintenon; it is cut very low, without shoulder-straps, arranged before in a drapery which forms a heart, and pointed at the bottom in front. Short sleeves with jockeys composed of three white satin folds, disposed in points de loup. A single row of trimming of the same kind terminates the sleeve, which is ornamented in front by a sprig of exotics placed upon the trimming. The front of the skirt is trimmed a l'Espagnole; that is, it is slashed at regular distances on each side leaving the under dress visible. A boquet of exotics, with their foliage, is placed on each slash, coiffure la Sevigne; the hair is parted so as to display the whole of the forehead, and dressed in corkscrew ringlets, which fall as low as the throat; it is quite flat on the crown of the head and turned up tightly in a low double bow behind. A chaplet of flowers, to correspond with the dress, surrounds the bow, and a gold bandeau, of the antique form adorns the forehead. Such of our fair readers as have visited the Museum of the Louvre, will recollect that this head-dress is exactly copied from a charming miniature of Mme. de Sevigne.—Necklace and ear rings, gold and pearl.—La Belle Assemblee.

It was observed the other day at the Garrick Club that W. Giblet of Bond street ought to be named as one of the Meat-ripolitan members.

Rev. Mr. Greatrake was recently married in the Western States. The Charleston City Gazette urges it as peculiarly improper for this gentleman, considering his cloth, to have made his wife a great rake too.

THE SERAPHINE,

A NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT, INVENTED BY

CHARLES G. CHRISTMAN,

No. 398 Pearl-Street.

AFTER a long time of uninterrupted perseverance, this extraordinary instrument is introduced to the public in its present very gratifying perfection. The Seraphine will be understood to be a keyed instrument, or an Organ in miniature, peculiarly adapted for domestic use; but it is not necessarily confined to domestic purposes; it is sufficiently powerful for small churches. It is impossible to conceive so small an instrument capable of producing such an immense volume of harmony; at the same time it is capable of the utmost possible delicacy of diminuendo and crescendo, from the soft sighing of the Æolian harp to the grandeur and majesty of the full chorus, in a degree of excellence never yet claimed by any other instrument. Such an instrument, independently of its novelty, cannot fail to be valuable to any performer on the pianoforte or organ.

N. B. At Mr Christman's Music store may be procured, eight key'd Flutes, Accordians, Pocket and Kent bugles, for which he has been honored with the first premium of the American Institute, also Guitars, Violins, Military and other Instruments; Music, which he has just published for the Guitar; the beautifull song Green Hills of Tyral, as sung by Mrs. Austin in the Opera of Cinderella, with three new Waltzes composed by O. Torpe, and to be continued in numbers.

Strings, and every article appertaining to the Music business.

American Feathered Game.

THE Subscriber proposes to publish by subscription, the following American Feathered Game, viz.—the Grouse, Pheasant, (or Partridge,) Partridge, (or Quail,) male or female, Woodcocks and Snipes.

These drawings will be made from the birds themselves of the size of life, and colored with the greatest accuracy. They will be drawn on plates 12 1-2 by 16 1-2 inches, and characteristic scenery introduced, so as to form a beautiful picture.

It appears to the publisher, that a paper of this kind is wanting in a country abounding so plentifully with this species of game; and, as no attempt has ever been made to picture our game birds in the proposed style, he hopes at least sufficient encouragement will be given to authorise the publication, even should no profit accrue to the publisher.

As the publisher has always felt an interest and pride in these birds, no pains will be spared to make the drawings perfect representations of the originals, and cried table to himself and his country, and as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers shall be obtained, the drawings will be commenced and the plates issued as they are published to subscribers, and in separate pasteboard scrolls with covers, to prevent injury.

These five plates will constitute those birds which are the chief objects of the pursuit in this sportsman's; but, as it seems desirable to introduce a prairie bird among so many land birds, the cassicks back Duck may be added to the list, if those who subscribe to the first format will authorize it.

Those who may not as to subscribe, will please send their names and addresses to the subscriber at as early a period as possible, stating whether they will take the five or six plates. Persons residing in distant towns will do well to join with some of their neighbors, as several subscriptions to one place will make it an object to form an agency there, to whom the plates may be sent, and payment made for the same.

In order to place the thing on a favorable footing and remove all difficulties from the minds of those who intend to subscribe, the publisher states, that they are at liberty to withdraw their subscriptions for the remainder of his plates, after the delivery of the first drawing, should it not equal their expectations or prove satisfactory; but failure to notify the publisher within one month after the receipt of the same, will be deemed by him an assent on their part, to take the whole originally subscribed for.

Terms $1.25 each plate, beautifully colored and in pasteboard cases, to be paid for on delivery.

All communications must be post paid, and addressed to the subscriber, No 5 Library street, Philadelphia. JNO. DOUGHTY.

THE PUGILIST TO HIS MISTRESS.

"——a black eye in a recent scuffle,
For sometimes we must box without the muffle"
DON JUAN.

All punished and penitent down on the knee
I bend to thee Kate, to avert an adieu:
Oh let not thine eyes, love, look black upon me,
Because mine are forc'd to look black upon you.

Am I worse in your eyes, for being worse in mine own?
Are the women to punish as well as the men?
I thought you'd have brought, when you found me alone,
Opodeldoc and smiles to restore me again.

You know I love sparring and poesy, Kate,
And scarcely care whether I'm hit at or kiss'd;
You know that Spring equally makes me elate,
With the blow of a flower, or the blow of a fist.

You know as you walked one damp evening of late,
With your beau at your side, that a bow in the sky
Arch'd its colors ethereal, and surely, my Kate,
Thus must be the rainbow I had in my eye.

Forgive me, and mufflers I'll carefully pull
O'er my knuckles h reafter, to make them well bred;
To mollify pugs in the kidney with wool,
And temper with leather a punch of the head.

And Kate!—if you ll fib from your forehead that frown,
And spar with a lighter and prettier tone;
I'll look—if the swelling should ever go down,
And these eyes look again—upon you, love, alone!

BOXING.—An elderly maiden lady has written us an expostulatory letter on this subject, in which she expresses herself shocked at the indecency of the spectacle of two enormous men (these are her very words) exhibiting themselves stripped before thousands of spectators. We answered that letter privately, and humbly suggested that a boxing was a no more indecent exhibition than a waltzing match. "Well, well, Mr. Editor, no more about indecency, but think of the cruelty, the brutality of boxing!" Brutal! no brute animal of our acquaintance is a pugilist. Dogs do not box cocks do not box—a bear is good at a close—but he is a round hitter, and too much of a ruffian for the ring. Man is, in fact, distinguished from the brute creation by nothing so much as being a boxing animal. He shares the faculty of speech with the bullfinch, the starling, the magpie and the parrot;—and in the art of cookery he is excelled by Delmonico,—extinguish in his bosom the love of pugilism, and you reduce him to a level with the beasts that perish. As to its cruelty, no doubt it would be to the last degree cruel for Fuller to tip some unsuspecting wight a stomacher; but who would talk of the cruelty of giving Fuller himself a facer. The fact is, that game pugilists enjoy intense pleasure in knocking and being knocked down; and there is not a sentiment of more acknowledged humanity than "pleasure in the way we like it." Dangerous it may be; but any one doctor that ever administered a prescription has killed more men than all the pugilists that ever fought, either with cestus or naked fists. So,

"Let Dares beat Entellus black and blue."

SEDUCTION.—At a recent Circuit Court in Wayne county, a verdict of $300 was obtained by Peter Garret, against Henry E. Youngs for the seduction of Garrett's daughter; and a verdict for $400 was given in favor of Dr. Alex. M'Intyre, of Palmyra, against Samuel Rogers, for slander.

A SHEEPISH TRICK.—On Friday afternoon, five men, belonging to Cape Cod fishing vessels lying in Newport, were arrested in the Neck, brought to town, and arraigned before two Justices upon a charge of stealing wool, by plucking it from the back of five sheep, belonging to the flock of G. S. Hazard. They pleaded guilty, and were mulcted by the Court in the sum of 25 dollars.

RAPID WORK.—Messrs. Phillip's and Graham purchased a tract of Land from Gen. Lacock, on the Ohio river, on Monday of last week, laid out a town on Tuesday, and built fourteen houses in four succeeding days. At this place they intend establishing their ship yard.—Beaver Argus.

A party of gentlemen, consisting of about wenty, gave a very splendid dinner at the Boston Exchange, on Thursday, to Mr. Sinclair of the Theatre, as a testimony of their respect for his private worth and professional talents. The entertainment passed off in the most harmonious and agreeable manner.

Some profound arithmetician being at a loss for something to do, has calculated that every inveterate snuff taker, who has continued this practice for forty years, has dedicated two entire years of his life to taking snuff—and two more in blowing his nose!

Mrs. Eliza Blond, was convicted, at the court of sessions, in Abbeville District, S. C. of keeping a Faro Bank, and playing at that game, and sentenced to six month's, imprisonment and a fine of five hundred dollars.

FEMALE PATRIOT.—Countess Emily de Plater, the Polish heroine, died a few days ago in Paris. This lady is memorable for commanding a regiment of horse, which she raised and equipped at her own expense.

Judge Prioleau, of Charleston City Court, has decided that a mule is not a horse; and that the city ordinance restraining horses from running at large, does not authorize the arrest of mules.

The charming Leontine Fay, whose services Laporte has engaged, is better known among the higher circles, under the name of "the Maid of Orleans."

We hear that Paganini acknowledges to having cleared £22,000 by his visit to England, and £6,000 by his stay in Paris.

A distinguished member of the Garrick rushed into the club the other night from a Drury Lane representation of "Robert le Diable," exclaiming "Bishopped, by G——!"

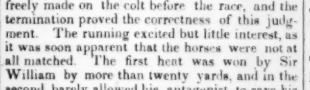
It was observed the other day at the Garrick Club that W. Giblet of Bond street ought to be named as one of the Meat-ripolitan members.

A fancy ball was given last week, by a celebrated Marchande des modes, near Hanover square, which is said to have exceeded all the entertainments of the season, in the elegance and whimsicality of its costumes, and the beauty of its guests. All the foreign artists (hairdressers, musicians, shoemakers, dancers—all are artistes with the French,) did honor to the fete, which was intended to commemorate some family event. Jarrin furnished a most elegant supper; and since the day of Boyle Farin, nothing has been so prettily arranged as the bal costume of la Reine des modes!

AN AMATEUR PIRATE.—The following anecdote refers to Mr. Trelawney, the author of the "Younger Son," recently published.

Piratical outrages were formerly of every day occurrence in the Eastern seas, and that they were not better known is attributable to the exterminating system of the rovers, whose motto was, that "dead men tell no tales." The answer made by T—— (one of Lord Byron's boon companions,) when asked by the noble bard how the pirates of the Eastern seas disposed of their prisoners, illustrates their motto better than any other description. T——, it seems, had past some time in a piratical bark, and Byron, who was always glad to have a ruffian hero in his train, did not like him the less for this little escapade. "Well, but how did you dispose of your prisoners?" said his lordship to him one day. "We never took any," the other coolly replied, "we always sent our Malays on board the prize, and they used to return and say that there was no one on board!" The Malays are celebrated for their unsparing use of the kriss or dagger.

A tradesman, deservedly dear to his late Majesty, has just failed for the sum of £140,000.



SAVANNAH RACES.

The Second Day's Race (which we continue from last week,) on the Bonadventure course, three mile heats, for a purse of $400, took place yesterday at 12 o'clock. But two horses were entered, Mr. Maun's C. Filly, Calanthe, 5 years old, and Mr. Bonner's C. H. Redgauntlet, 5 years old, the unsuccessful competitor for the purse of the day previous. From the fact that the horse had contended for the purse of $1000 on the Charleston Course in February, and being otherwise a nag of some note, he was the favorite, notwithstanding his defeat on Wednesday; but the first heat, after a beautiful contest, was won by Calanthe, by nearly a length. Having displayed her fleetness, strong hopes were entertained by her friends of her ultimate success, and such was the result, she winning also the second heat by about three lengths.

TIME.
1st heat, 5m. 58s. | 2d heat, 6m. 2s.

About the same number of persons were present as on the day before, and among the carriages we were gratified to perceive a considerable number containing a portion of the beauty and fashion of the city.

The following horses have been entered for this day's purse of $250, 2 mile heats.

Mr. Haun's C. S. Colt, Sir William, 2 years old.—Riders dress, chocolate-colored jacket and black cap.

Mr. Grimes' C. S. G., Nat Cook, 5 years old. Riders dress, blue and pink.

The Third Race being for a purse of $250, took place yesterday as advertised. But two horses were entered, Mr. Houn's Sir William, 2 years old, and Mr. Grimes' Ned Cook, 5 years old, both sorrels, the color of every animal that has yet run this season. Bets two to one were freely made on the colt before the race, and the termination proved the correctness of this judgment. The running excited but little interest, as it was soon apparent that the horses were not at all matched. The first heat was won by Sir William by more than twenty yards, and in the second barely allowed his antagonist to save his distance.

TIME.
1st heat, 3m. 58s. | 2d heat, 4m. 5s.

This is the last day of the races, and the following horses are entered:

Mr. Bonner's c. h. Redgauntlet, 5 years old.
Mr. Wallace's s. f. Pausey, 2 years old.
Mr. Haun's c. s. h. Sir William, 5 years old.
Mr. Winkler's s. g. Slapsides, 5 years old.

MILLEDGEVILLE, (Geo.) April 19, 1832.

THE RACES,

Over the Course at this city, commenced on Wednesday last, and continued four days. The Course was in good order, and well attended by numerous spectators; the weather was fine, and every thing went off with great eclat.

First Day, six colts were started for a sweepstake of 150 dollars, 1 mile and repeat, and was soon decided by Mr. Puryear's brown bay colt, Belisarius, 4 years old, by Mucklejohn from an Oscar mare, distancing the field the first round, time 1 minute 55 1-2 seconds.

Second Day, three mile heats—Mr. Bell's bay mare, Jane Medill, 4 years old, double Archer, and Mr. Vanlandingham's sorrel horse Mucklejohn, 4 years old, by Mucklejohn from a Potomac and Gallatin mare, contended for a jockey club purse of 250 dollars. At the tap of the drum they went off finely, Mucklejohn taking the lead and coming out about 100 yards a head under a tight pull; time 6 minutes 6 seconds. 2d heat Mucklejohn started badly, running against the Judges stand and endeavoring to bolt, but finally got off and contended closely for the heat, but Jane taking the lead from the start seemed to keep it with ease until the last round, when both were urged with whip and spur, Jane coming out about a length a head, time 6 minutes 9 seconds. 3d Heat both appeared in fine spirits and went off finely, Jane taking the lead, Mucklejohn gaining at the coming out of each mile—at the last quarter stretch of the last round he came up with Jane, and when urged to pass, he bolted from the outer to the inner track—he was again urged forward, and again came up with Jane and bolted within ten feet of the Judges stand, determining the race in favor of Jane Medill—time 6 min. 9 1-2 sec.

Third Day, two mile heats—Mr Vanlandingham's sorrel horse, Littlejohn, 5 years old, by Mucklejohn, from a Potomac and Gallatin mare; and Mr. Purvear's colt Belisarius, were entered for a Jockey Club purse of $200. At the signal for saddling, Belisarius did not appear,—said to have choked himself the night previous; when Wymen's came forward and entered his bay mare, Polly Powell, 4 years old, by Jackson, from a Dion mare. At the tap of the drum, they started finely, Littlejohn taking the lead, and coming about 70 yards a head, under a pull. Polly Powell's rider broke his stirrup the last round; time 4 min. 11 sec. 2d. Heat a good start, Littlejohn taking the lead, Polly Powell trailing close; at the last half mile stretch she made an effort to pass, and locked him for a few paces, but finally fell back, and gave up the race—time 4 minutes.

Fourth Day, one mile, three best in five—Gate money, &c. $200. Mr. Hibler's saddle horse Romeo, 5 years old, Mr. Vanlandingham's sorrel horse, Mucklejohn, Mr. Bell's horse Van Buren 5 years old, by Carolinian from an Archer mare, and Mr. Puryear's bay mare Hulda Ware, 6 years old, by Sir Andrew from an Oscar mare were started. 1st Heat was taken by Hulda Ware; time 1 min. 56 sec. 2d Heat Hulda Ware again came out a head, under whip and spur, trailed close by Romeo, time 1 min. 55 sec.—this heat Mucklejohn fell on making the last turn, and though he came out without his rider, saving his distance, not having his weight he was declared distanced. 3d Heat Van Buren took the lead and came out a head, with apparent ease, time 1 min. 58 sec. 4th Heat, Romeo was withdrawn, the remaining two went off finely, Hulda Ware taking the lead to the second turn, when Van Buren passed her and came out a head, time 2 min. 1 sec. 5th Heat Van Buren took the lead, trailed close to half way the first quarter stretch, when he seemed to fail, Hulda Ware passed and came out a head, time 1 min. 57 sec.

The time was kept by three disinterested and respectable gentlemen.

NEW-ORLEANS RACES.

The Race on yesterday, (April 14,) of two miles and repeat, for a purse of $300 was run by Polly Powell, Andrew Jackson, and Boscovo. The latter was distanced the first heat, and the second heat Andrew Jackson was withdrawn, leaving Polly Powell mistress of the field—time 3m. 48s.

COUGAR HUNTING,

IN NEW-YORK AND PENNSYLVANIA.

In the United States, the destruction of this animal is usually effected with the rifle. Our hunters, by reason of great perfection in shooting this instrument of death, and their familiarity with the Cougars, regard these animals in no other light than certain victims to their unerring aim; few indeed escape, when once the keen eye of the hunter ranges the barrel of his rifle, or the new fallen snow betrays the footsteps of these wily destroyers. Its ferocity is easily excited, and when a painful wound is inflicted, its rage is terrible, and will evince the utmost determination to revenge itself. Many anecdotes may be told, illustrative of this disposition; one or two however, will suffice.

A party of hunters, residents of Delaware county, in the state of New-York, made an excursion after a Cougar, which had frequently been seen prowling about the neighborhood. Before starting, the preliminary agreed on was, that if the Cougar should be started, and treed, it was not to be shot until each individual composing the party should be present—this agreement broken, a penalty of all the expenses of the day, was to be imposed on the offender. Shortly after starting, the dogs aroused the anima, and after a chase of a few miles, along the mountains, among rocks and almost impenetrable laurels, it took to a beach tree, and clambered to the top, about thirty feet from the ground, where it crouched, and watched the dogs, which were in numbers barking at the foot of the tree. Among the party was a stranger, who had never experienced a hunt of the kind, and regardless of the penalty to which he would subject himself resolved at all hazards to shoot the Cougar, if an opportunity offered, and enjoy the satisfaction of having destroyed one of the most ferocious wild animals of our forests. Accordingly he hastened to the scene of action, when he saw the animal resting on the tree, and immediately fired at its heart—but to his astonishment, instead of killing he only aroused its vengeance; for the moment he discharged his rifle, the Cougar began to growl and spit, and rip and tear every limb of the tree within its reach, and when on the point of leaping at the hunter, a shot from an unknown rifle, hurled the animal to the ground dead, within ten or twelve feet of the person who first fired, and who being so excessively frightened, and overcome with terror, that he sunk helpless on the ground, and but for the fortunat intervention of his friend, would have been torn to pieces. Being on a rocky precipice, and the place so overgrown with high laurels, he did not see two of the hunters who had arrived a few moments before him; neither were they aware that any of the party were present but themselves, until they heard the report of the rifle within a few yards of them, and being experienced hunters, they knew by its actions, that the animal was aiming the destruction of their friend, and the timely interference and unerring aim of Capt W——, only saved its life.

The following anecdote, which is copied from Godman's Natural History, was furnished by the late William Scudder, who had the Cougar, and which is still in the N. York Museum.

"Two hunters, accompanied by two dogs, went out in quest of game near the Kaatskill Mountains. At the foot of a large hill, they agreed to go round it in opposite directions, and when either discharged his rifle, the other was to hasten towards him, to aid in securing the game. Soon after parting, the report of a rifle was heard by one of them, who, hastening towards the spot, after some search, found nothing but the dog, dreadfully lacerated, and dead. He now became much alarmed for the fate of his companion, and while anxiously looking around, was horror-struck by the harsh growl of a Cougar, which he perceived on a large limb of a tree, crouching on the body of his friend, and apparently meditating an attack on himself. Instantly he leveled his rifle at the beast, and was so fortunate as to wound it mortally, when it fell to the ground along with the body of his slaughtered companion. His dog then rushed upon the wounded Cougar, which, with one blow of its paw, laid the poor creature dead by its side. The surviving hunter now left the spot, and quickly returned with several other persons, when they found the lifeless Cougar extended near the dead bodies of the hunter and the faithful dogs."

The Cougar is exceedingly tenacious of its food, and rather than relinquish it, will suffer death. Instances of this kind sometimes occur, which the following anecdote from the same author will show.

"About five miles from Phillipsburgh, Centre county, Pennsylvania, Mr. Mitchell, on the 8th of December, 1825, shot at a buck, and wounded him in the shoulder. He followed the animal for some time, and at length perceived him at the distance of about forty yards, lying with his heels upwards, and a Cougar holding him by the throat. The hunter discharged his rifle at the Cougar, and shot it through the heart; when this animal relinquished the buck, advanced four or five yards, and fell lifeless. Having again charged his rifle, and believing the Panther to be dead, Mr. Mitchell, turning towards the wounded buck, was surprised to see another Cougar in the act of pulling down the head; and, as it now appeared, the buck had been held down by both Cougars at the moment the first was killed. The body of the buck was between the hunter and the second Cougar, nothing but the head of which was visible. At this Mr. Mitchell levelled his rifle, and the ball entered it at the angle of the eye. The beast remained still for a few minutes, and then, for the first time, relinquished his hold of the buck, and walked over it towards the hunter, who fired his rifle a second time, and shot him through in the neighborhood of the heart. At this moment the buck recovered his legs, stumbled over the body of the Cougar, finally extricated himself, and ran off. A third discharge of the rifle, pierced the Cougar with another ball, yet he still remained on his feet, and it was not until the rifle was again discharged, and a fourth ball driven through the back part of the under jaw, that the animal fell and expired. What is most singular is, that the male should not have relinquished his hold of the buck when the female was killed, but continued in the same position until the ball entered his own head, near the eye. The buck ran near a mile before he was finally overtaken, and killed."—American Rural Sports.

THE DOG FISHER.

We give the following extract of a letter, inserted in the old Sporting Magazine of the present month, as a very singular evidence of the extraordinary sagacity of the dog. It appears from this letter, that a dog of no particular breed was given some time back to the superintendent of a salmon fishery at Cruives, in the vicinity of Aberdeen.—Bell.

"Mr. S., the worthy superintendent alluded to (says the writer), is a person not only extremely attentive to the discharge of his trust, but is also endowed with much curious observation. Study, and his nightly vigils, have not yet reduced him to a skeleton, though his grief for the loss of his favorite dog has certainly, from being a very portly good looking man, brought him nearer the chance of going through the eye of a needle. He soon saw something more than common in the dog, which I should long since have told, you was christened by the name of Tiger. Withthat grateful instinct which characterises his race, this sagacious creature began to consider, as it were, how to render himself useful to the kind hand that fed and caressed him; and for that purpose, in constantly attending his master to the water side, saw that fish was the object, and water the element he had to study. Accordingly, although smooth haired, and without a particle of the spaniel, Newfoundlander, or water dog in him, he set about swimming and learning to practise all manner of aquatic evolutions, snuffing about the nets, and at first fearfully approaching the salmon as they were drawn to shore, and then eager to mouth them. For a while, led only by the sweep of the net, and sight of the corks upbearing it, but by degrees, eagerly watching the practised eyes of the fishermen who see long down the stream the approach of fish by a particular swirl on the surface of the river, immediately over the salmon (imperceptible to any vision but their own.) Tiger soon became as expert at this as themselves; and at his warning would they always beset themselves, and generally with success. Not only did the dog do this, but he went further—he saw the fish for himself, and took them by himself, without the assistance of man, or material of any kind! At first, as was to be expected, his success was small, but his instinct soon made him expert, and he has been known to kill from twelve to fifteen salmon in a day. In the coldest mornings and the darkest nights, he was, it may be said, never off guard, nor ever so happy as when on it. In a middling river, when the water was not too high he would place himself for hours together on a stone a little below the rapids, and watch the fish coming up, allow it to pass him, when following it up to the rush at the bottom of the dykes, where it was shallower, bounce at once on his prey, and fixing his teeth a little below the neck, keep fast hold, and struggling with the salmon, sometimes above water, and sometimes below it, go down the stream for a considerable distance, and almost always returning victor. With a high river when in a speat as we say here, after much rain, he would perch himself on the very edge of the high Cruive dyke, with the water rolling and bubbling about him to his belly, watching the dart upwards of the fish, and, immediately he saw one, spring at it at all hazards till he laid it on the bank, wagging his tail and seemingly more delighted than the fishermen at the proportion his individual exertions contributed to the general stock. On one occasion he grappled with an enormous fish of twenty-three pounds, sustained a desperate battle with it, and had nearly mastered it, when a fisherman, seeing the struggle, went to Tiger's assistance, laid hold of the salmon by the tail, and before the dog had quitted the gripe, the fish, by a convulsive twist, laid both man and dog on their backs—but fish though it was, that salmon went the way of all flesh. On another occasion his master had left him at twelve o'clock on a Sunday night, before the fishing season commences on Monday morning, chained to his couch. Tiger drew the couch down the bank to the river, and breaking the chain, killed several salmon ere Mr. S.'s return. On one particularly stormy night—so bad that the fishermen were driven to shelter in a public house hard by—Tiger disdained to quit his spot, and killed of himself seven fish that very night whilst they were soliciting themselves. If his master was at home, and said, "Tiger, there is a fish coming—off he went, wagging his tail, and either returned sorrowful, or his whiskers garnished with fresh salmon scales in proof of his industry! If the fish was small, he would bring it ashore, 'as if he had a tobacco-pipe in his mouth,' as the fishermen termed it. It would be endless to recount the thousandth part of the numerous instances of the sagacity, industry, patience, and spirit of this invaluable dog—his affection, his intelligence I may say, and the unwearied desire he manifested, as it were, to show his sense of duty to those who supported and were kind to him! And what was his end? Does he yet live, basking in his old age in the sunshine of their favor and protection? I almost shudder with indignation when I write it—this animal, so favored by Nature, and so distinguished by the dumb attributes of every good quality a poor quadruped could possess, was last week only most inhumanly shot by some miscreant hand, which has not yet been discovered, although a considerable reward has been offered for the detection of the brute who could kill such a dog."—Bell's Life in London.

DENTIST

Dr. I. Francis,

SURGEON DENTIST, 93 Chatham street, between Duane and Pearl streets, New-York, respectfully informs the Ladies and Gentlemen, that he continues to practice in all the various branches of his profession, from the setting of a single tooth to a full set. He cleans, divides, and fills hollow teeth in the neatest manner, and warrants his Antiodontalgic Wash, as completely efficacious in curing the diseases of the gums, fastening loose teeth, preserving those that are carious from further decay; and is a certain cure for the tooth ache. His Terri Metallic Incorruptible Teeth are a real imitation of nature; and having passed the ordeal of fire in making them, they do not absorb the saliva so as to become offensive either to the taste or smell; no particle of food can adhere to them, so the breath remains sweet. The incorruptible teeth retain color, solidity, durability, polish, strength and beauty not surpassed by any. He also sets Artificial Human Eyes which cannot be distinguished from real, and will perform every motion of the eye, without giving the slightest pain. Those wishing to honor him with their commands, will find his charges moderate. The poor attended to every morning, from 7 to 8 o'clock, gratis. dec 24 1

TEMPERANCE HOUSE OF REFRESHMENTS, AND READING ROOM.

THE subscriber returns his sincere thanks for the encouragement he has met with, since his commencement. He now informs his friends and the public generally, that he has taken and neatly fitted up the whole of the basement story in the FRANKLIN BUILDINGS, corner of Ann and Nassau streets, in a manner which enables him to accommodate any number, and hopes by his endeavors to give satisfaction to merit a continuance of their patronage. Refreshments of all kinds excepting inebriating liquors from sun-rise to 10 o'clock in the evening.

DENTIST

Dr. S. BAKER & SONS,

SURGEON DENTISTS, 177 Broadway, a few doors from Courtlandt St. New-York, respectfully inform the Ladies and Gentlemen, that he continues to practice in all the various branches of his profession from the setting of a single tooth to a full set of the best kind of teeth of every description. He also cleans, divides and fills hollow teeth and extracts in the best and most careful manner. All teeth shall be set with the greatest care and ease to the patient, and his charges shall be moderate. He also makes and has on hand the best of TOOTH POWDER at a reasonable price; and if it do not suit, after a person has tried it once with warm water at night, they are at liberty to return it, and receive their money. For a dentist to advise people respecting their teeth is very difficult; for many directly think that he advises for his own good, and not for the good of their teeth; and in this way, and by neglect of parents, thousands of young people's teeth begin to rot before they know it.

We shall be happy to wait upon those ladies and gentlemen who desire our attendance at their respective dwellings.

Notice to Printers.

TIME and extensive use having tested and established the superiority of my Machine Cast Type, over that cast by hand, I beg leave to call your attention to the following remarks:—

By the aid of a forcing pump, applied at the instant of forming the letter, the metal is compressed and rendered much more compact at the letter end of the type than when cast by hand. The air in the mould, by this process, is driven from the letter to the foot end of the type, and finding no way of escape, the mouth being closed, it there occupies a portion of the space in the mould, which otherwise would (as in hand casting) be filled with metal; thereby forming cavities within the stems, by which the weight of the type is diminished 10 to 12 per cent. below that cast by hand, yet leaving the shank of the type abundantly strong. My recent improvement in the composition of type metal, with the advantages before named, gives a durability to type cast by this process, not attainable by the ordinary mode of casting. To my former extensive variety, has recently been added a series of much admired Light Face'd Type.

Your orders are respectfully solicited, by

Your obedient servant. E. WHITE,
m 21 No. 108 Pearl Street.
